support of one of the factions. Thus he commissioned four of his associates, with whom he had been in league in al-Baḥrayn and who had campaigned on his behalf. Their names were Muḥammad b. Salm al-Qaṣṣāb al-Hajarī, Buraysh al-Qurayʿī, ʿAlī al-Ḍarrāb, and al-Ḥusayn al-Ṣaydanānī; they proclaimed their revolt in the ʿAbbād mosque.[135] No one, however, responded to the appeal. Indeed, some [1746] soldiers chanced upon them, and they were forced to disperse without having won anyone over. ʿAlī fled al-Baṣrah, with Ibn Rajāʾ in search of him, albeit in vain. Ibn Rajāʾ was informed of a number of Baṣrans who sympathized with Ali, and he had them arrested and imprisoned.

Among those jailed were Yaḥyā b. Abī Thaʿlab, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan al-Iyādī, and the eldest son of the Zanj leader himself, ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Akbar, together with his wife, the mother of their son, and another daughter of his and a pregnant servant girl. ʿAlī, however, set out for Baghdad, accompanied by his associates Muḥammad b. Salm, Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad, Sulaymān b. Jāmiʾ, and Buraysh al-Qurayʿī.

When they had reached the marshlands (al-baṭīḥah)[136] one of the *mawlā*s of the Bāhilīs,[137] who administered the area, was on the lookout for them. His name was ʿUmayr b. ʿAmmār. He arrested them and conveyed them to the governor of Wāsiṭ, Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn. ʿAlī employed all his cunning and persuasion with Ibn Abī ʿAwn until at last he and his companions were released. From there ʿAlī traveled to Madīnat al-Salām, where he remained for a year. While in Baghdad he claimed to be related to Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Zayd.[138] He alleged that during his sojourn in the city signs appeared to him, allowing him insight into the minds of his companions and what each of them was doing. He besought his Lord for some token

---

135. See H. Halm, Die Traditionen über den Aufstand ʿAlī Ibn Muḥammads, des "Herrn der Zanǧ," 44–49, where he notes that, apart from the Shīʿite character of the revolt, the Zanj leader's following was comprised almost exclusively of *mawla*s.

136. See EI,[2] s.v. "al-Baṭīḥa." The word, which frequently occurs in the plural, baṭāʾiḥ, applied to a very extensive area of swampland located on the lower course of the Tigris and Euphrates between al-Kūfah and Wāsiṭ in the north and al-Baṣrah, in the south. See also the articles in EI,[2] s.vv. "al-Furāt," "Didjla"; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description of Mesopotamia and Baghdad," 297–99.

137. On this anxient Arabian tribe, see EI,[2] s.v. "Bāhila."

138. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 208, lengthens the Zaydite connection, adding Muḥammad before Aḥmad.

revealing the true state of his own situation, and he saw on a wall a message being written to him by an invisible hand.

One of his followers reported that, during his stay in Madīnat al-Salām, ʿAlī won over to his side a number of persons. Among them were Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad al-Ṣūḥānī, who was a descendant of Zayd b. Ṣūḥān, Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim, and two servants[139] of Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khāqān,[140] who were named Mushriq and Rafīq.
[1747] He renamed Mushriq Ḥamzah and gave him his agnomen Abū Aḥmad. Rafīq he renamed Jaʿfar, his agnomen becoming Abū al-Faḍl.

During ʿAlī's stay this year in Madīnat al-Salām Muḥammad b. Rajāʾ was removed from his post in al-Baṣrah. When he left the leaders of the Bilāliyyah and Saʿdiyyah factions responsible for the civil disorder attacked and opened the prisons, releasing all the inmates. When the news reached ʿAlī that his family was among those freed, he departed for al-Baṣrah, returning there in the month of Ramaḍān 255 (August 11–September 9, 869). Accompanying him was ʿAlī b. Abān, who had joined up with him in Baghdad. Also with him were Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad, Muḥammad b. Salm, Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ, and the two servants (ghulāms) of Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, Mushriq, and Rafīq. A soldier called Abū Yaʿqūb, who later adopted the sobriquet Jurbān, met with the other six, and they all set off together. Finally arriving at a place called Barankhal,[141] they settled there in a castle called al-Qurashī,[142] which was located on a canal called ʿAmūd ibn al-Munajjim, as it was the Banū Mūsā b. al-Munajjim who had excavated it. Now ʿAlī gave out that he was acting as an agent on behalf of one of [the Caliph] al-Wāthiq's sons, handling the sale of sibākh; he thus ordered his companions to treat him as such, and there he remained.

---

139. On the various meanings of the word ghulām (plural ghilmān) see EI,² s.v. "Ghulām." The present narrative on the Zanj treats of a different context from that of the ruling circles in Baghdad or Sāmarrā; thus the renderings "attendant," "guard," "servant," and "page" are not always appropriate where the Zanj are concerned. See also EI,² s.v. "Djaysh," especially p. 507, for the term "young soldier." In what follows relating to affairs of the Zanj, unless otherwise noted, the word ghulām is translated loosely as "slave." See n. 59, above.

140. Yaḥyā, a cousin of the Caliph al-Mutawakkil's vizier ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān, in 245/860 held a post in the public treasury, owing to ʿUbaydallāh's influence. See Ṭabarī, III, 1446.

141. The reading is uncertain. Halm, Traditionen, 76, adopts the reading Branhal.

142. Following Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 32, Popovic, Révolte, 78, locates al-Qurashī at a place called Bi'r Nakhl.

It was reported from Rayḥān b. Ṣāliḥ, one of the slaves (ghilmān) of the Shūrajiyyīn,[143] who was the first of their number to join ʿAlī, that he said: "I was in charge of my master's slaves (ghilmān), transporting flour from al-Baṣrah to the Shūrajiyyīn and distributing it among them. I had conveyed a cargo to them as usual an on the way passed by the place where ʿAlī was staying, that is, at Barankhal in the castle al-Qurashī, when his supporters seized me and took me to him. I was ordered to greet him as amīr, which I did. He asked me where I had come from, and I told him that I had come from al-Baṣrah. He asked whether I had heard any news about them in al-Baṣrah, and I replied that I had not. He then asked me if there was any news of al-Zaynabī,[144] and I told him I knew nothing about him. Then he said: 'Tell me of the activities of the Bilāliyyah and Saʿdiyyah factions.' I replied that I had no information on them either. Finally, he inquired whether I knew anything of the slaves of the Shūrajiyyin and what each was doing in the business of transporting flour, sawīq,[145] and dates and also about those among both the freedmen (al-aḥrār) and slaves (al-ʿabīd)[146] who worked in the salt steppe (shūraj). I told him what I knew of these matters. He appealed to me to join him, to which I agreed. He then said to me, 'Induce as many slaves as you can to join, and bring them to me.' He promised to extend various benefits to me and make me their commander. He also made me solemnly vow that I would not disclose his whereabouts to anyone and that I would return to him. He then allowed me to proceed on my way. I delivered the flour tht I was carrying to its intended destination. I was away for the whole of that day and returned to Ali's camp the next morning." [1748]

When I arrived Rafīq, the servant of Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, had also arrived at the camp. He had been sent to al-Baṣrah with

143. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, s.vv. shūrajī, k-s-ḥ. The Shūrajiyyīn were blacks engaged in the removal of the nitrous topsoil (sibākh) in the marshland. Although it is admittedly impossible to determine whether this group was comprised exclusively of freedmen or slaves, I have adopted the view that both were to be found in their ranks, though with the exception of certain explicit contexts (for example, see nn. 146 and 156, below) I have preferred for the purposes of this translation to indicate their status as servile.

144. His full name was Abū Manṣūr ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Zaynabī, who will be noted on p. 752, below, leading a force of Baṣrans against the Zanj.

145. A prepared dish of parched barley meal often carried by travelers, as it can be reconstituted from its dried form by adding water or milk.

146. See n. 143, above.

some of his business goods. He arrived with Shibl b. Sālim, one of the slaves of the al-Dabbāsīn,[147] who had with him a piece of silk material, which ʿAlī had commissioned him to purchase to have it made into a banner (liwāʾ).[148] Written upon it in red and green char-[1749] acters were the following words: "God has purchased the souls of believers and their property, for they have attained to paradise fighting in the way of God," to the end of the verse.[149] ʿAlī's name and that of his father were also inscribed upon it, and the banner was fastened to the top of a barge pole.

In the early morning of Saturday, the 28th of Ramaḍān [September 9, 869], ʿAlī set out from [the castle al-Qurashī]. When he had reached the farthest end of the castle precinct, some slaves of one of the Shūrajiyyīn known as al-ʿAṭṭār met him as they were setting about their business. ʿAlī ordered them to be seized, along with their agent, who was placed in fetters. They numbered in all some fifty slaves. ʿAlī next proceeded to a place where al-Sanāʾī worked, and there around five hundred slaves were seized, among them one who was known as Abū Ḥudayd. Their agent was likewise bound with fetters and taken along as well. The place where this occurred was called Nahr al-Mukāthir. ʿAlī proceeded next to a place belonging to al-Sīrāfī and captured there another one hundred fifty slaves, among them an individual called Zurayq and another known as Abū al-Khanjar. Then, at a place belonging to Ibn ʿAṭāʾ, Ṭarīq, Ṣubayḥ al-Aʿsar, Rāshid al-Maghribī, and Rāshid al-Qarmaṭī were captured along with eighty more slaves. The next place was that of Ismāʿīl, who was known as a slave of Sahl al-Ṭaḥḥān. ʿAlī continued to operate in this fashion all day until he had amassed a large number of the Shūrajiyyīn slaves.

Assembling them together, ʿAlī rose and addressed them, raising their spirits by promising to lead and command them and to give them possession of property. He swore a solemn oath to them that [1750] he would neither deceive nor betray them and that they would experience only kind treatment from him. ʿAlī then summoned their

147. Sellers of dibs, the juice pressed from fresh dates.

148. On the uses of banners and flags, see EI[2] s.v. "ʿAlam."

149. Qurʾān 9:111. Although the symbolism of the Zanj revolt was ʿAlid, this verse has associations with the early Khārijite rebels, who may have referred to themselves as al-Shurāt (pl. of Shārī) "vendors," i.e., those who have sold their souls for the cause of God. See EI[2] s.v. "Khāridjites."

masters and said to them: "I wanted to behead you all for the way you have treated these slaves, with arrogance and coercion and, indeed, in ways that Allāh has forbidden, driving them beyond endurance. But my companions have spoken to me about you, and now I have decided to set you free."

They replied that the slaves were merely habitual runaways, who would flee from ʿAlī [at the first opportunity], and then both he and they would be the losers. They said, "Turn them over to us, and let us pay you compensation for them." But ʿAlī ordered their slaves to bring whips of palm branches and, while their masters and agents were prostrated on the ground, each one was given five hundred lashes. ʿAlī extracted a vow from them, on penalty of having to repudiate their wives,[150] that they would neither divulge his whereabouts to anyone nor reveal the size of his following. They were then released and sent on their way to al-Baṣrah.

One of their number, a man named ʿAbdallāh and known as Karīkhā,[151] crossed over the Dujayl[152] and warned the Shūrajiyyīn to guard their slaves carefully. There were some fifteen thousand there at the time.

After performing the afternoon prayer ʿAlī ventured forth again, and upon reaching the bank of the Dujayl he found there boats laden with compost of dung and ashes (samād) entering port on the rising tide. Together with his partisans he traversed the river in them and then went on to the Nahr Maymūn.[153] He established his quarters in the mosque situated in the middle of the market that stretched along the Nahr Maymūn. He continued efforts to gather blacks (al-sudān)[154] to his camp right up to the time of the prayer breaking the fast of Ramaḍān (ṣalāt al-fiṭr).[155] On the day of the celebration of the feast he summoned his followers to assemble for prayer. When they

---

150. On the gravity of this oath, see EI,[1] s.v. "Ṭalaḳ."

151. Or, in an alternative reading, Karankha.

152. Literally, "Little Tigris," but here referring to the river Dujayl in al-Ahwāz, in order to distinguish it from the Dujayl canal of the Tigris to the north of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 232.

153. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 719. The Arabic word nahr can mean both "river" and "canal," and it is not always possible to distinguish them, given the nature of the primary sources; here, however, the term means canal.

154. See EI,[2] s.v. "ʿAbd." Although it is not entirely clear from Ṭabarī's usage, the term sudān (pl. of aswad) may be intended by him as synonym for the Zanj.

had done so, the pole flying his banner was set into the ground. ʿAlī [1751] prayed with them, and in a sermon (khuṭbah) he recalled the wretched state from which, through him, God had rescued them. ʿAlī said that he wanted to improve their condition, giving them slaves (al-ʿabīd), money, and homes to possess for themselves, and that by them they could achieve the greatest things.[156] He then swore a solemn oath, and when his prayer and sermon were complete he ordered those who had followed his words to instruct those non-Arabic speakers among them who had not understood, in order [also] to raise their spirits. That was done, and ʿAlī entered the castle.

A day later he set out for Nahr Būr, where a detachment of his troops encountered a detachment of the [commander] al-Ḥimyarī and drove them off into the desert. The Zanj leader, accompanied by some more troops, joined forces with the others and defeated al-Ḥimyarī and his troops, driving them back as far as the Tigris flats. One of the superintendents of the blacks, called Abū Ṣāliḥ and known as "the Short," sought protection for himself and three hundred Zanj. ʿAlī graciously granted this and promised them good fortune. When the numbers of Zanj who had been thus gathered together increased significantly, he appointed leaders for them and said that, for each of them who brought another Zanj, he would be attached to him.

It is also said that ʿAlī did not appoint his commanders until after the battle of slaves (al-khawal)[157] in Bayān[158] and his move to Sabkhat al-Qandal.[159]

---

155. EI,[2] s.v. "ʿĪd al-Fiṭr."

156. M. A. Shaban, Islamic History, II, 101, argues that ʿAlī b. Muḥammad's movement was not a slave revolt but rather an ethnic Zanj or black revolt. He notes that some of the first to fight against ʿAlī were themselves employed in working the salt marshes (see, e.g., n. 163, below). In his view there were only a few runaway slaves, the vast majority of rebels being Arabs, with the support of free East Africans who had made their homes in the region. Certainly the interpretation of these events rests upon one's understanding of such highly ambiguous words as ghulām, sudān, ʿabīd, and khawal. Indeed Ṭabarī himself is far from consistent in his use of the word ghulām. In the present context ʿAlī's words and actions clearly suggest that those he was dealing with at this stage of his movement were of a relatively depressed, if not entirely servile, condition. Popovic in his detailed study of the revolt is unable to commit himself firmly on the question, and the truth most likely lies somewhere between Shaban's interpretation and the earlier view represented by T. Nöldeke in "A Servile War in the East."

157. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. kh-w-l; n. 156, above.

158. A village situtated on a canal of the same name was located on the eastern side

Ibn Abī ʿAwn was transferred from the governorship of Wāsiṭ to that of al-Ubullah and the districts of the Tigris. On the day that [ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] appointed his commanders news reportedly reached him that al-Ḥimyarī and ʿAqīl, along with Ibn Abī ʿAwn's deputy, who had been stationed in al-Ubullah, had advanced toward him and were encamped at Nahr Ṭīn. ʿAlī ordered his troops to move to al-Razīqiyyah, which was located at the far side of al-Bā- [1752] dhāward.[160] He reached there at the time of the midday prayer, which they performed and then prepared for battle. At the time where were only three swords in ʿAlī's so-called "army"—namely, his own, that of ʿAlī b. Abān, and that of Muḥammad b. Salm. Between the time of the midday and afternoon prayers, ʿAlī departed [from al-Razīqiyyah] with his troops and hastened back toward al-Muḥammadiyyah,[161] placing ʿAlī b. Abān in their rear with orders to report on anyone following them. He himself proceeded at the head of the company [of blacks] until they reached al-Muḥammadiyyah. He sat by the water's edge and ordered the company to quench their thirst. When the troops arrived, ʿAlī b. Abān said to him that they had seen swords glistening and heard the sounds of people moving behind them but that they could not tell whether they were moving away or heading toward them. He was still speaking when the enemy arrived. The Zanj called one another to arms and Abū Ṣāliḥ Mufarraj al-Nūbī hastened forth with Rayḥān b. Ṣāliḥ and Fatḥ al-Ḥajjām. Fatḥ had been eating [at the time], and so he went into the fray holding his plate. As his companions advanced, one of the Shūrajiyyīn called Bulbul encountered Fatḥ, who attacked him with his plate and beat him with it, causing Bulbul to drop his weapon, turn, and flee. He and four thousand other men were put to flight, some being killed and others dying of thirst on the way. A number, too, were of the Tigris estuary, on the way to al-Ahwāz. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 307–9.

---

159. The salt flat (sabkhah) situated by the Nahr al-Qandal (or al-Qandil), one of the nine major canals flowing into the estuary at al-Baṣrah. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 304.

160. A town located between Wāsiṭ and al-Baṣrah. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 318, vocalizes the word Bādhāward.

161. Ibn Serapion speaks of a great lagoon (hawr) called al-Muḥammadiyyah, the largest one of four in the swampland (baṭaʾih) near al-Baṣrah. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 297, 299.

taken captive and brought to the leader of the Zanj who ordered them [1753] beheaded. Their heads were stacked on the backs of mules seized from the Shūrajiyyīn, who had used them for transporting the nitrous topsoil (shūraj). The procession set out and reached al-Qādisiyyah[162] by the time of the evening prayer.

A mawlā of the Hāshimites[163] attacked ʿAlī's company outside the village and killed one of the blacks. The news was brought to ʿAlī, and his companions asked him for permission to sack the village and search for the culprit who had killed their comrade. He replied saying, "That would be impossible without our knowing what the villagers intended and whether the killer acted with their consent. We will ask them to deliver him to us. If they do so, fine, but, if not, then it would be lawful for us to slay them."

ʿAlī urged them to prepare quickly for departure, and they returned to Nahr Maymūn, where he established himself in the same mosque that he had initially used. He ordered the heads [of the Shūrajiyyīn] to be brought as well and publicly displayed. He instructed Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Nūbī to make the call to prayer. This he did, saluting ʿAlī as the amīr. Then ʿAlī prayed the late evening prayer with his companions and spent the night there. The following morning ʿAlī set out again, first passing by the [village] of al-Karkh, before arriving at a village called Jubbā.[164] It was the time of the midday prayer. He crossed over the Dujayl (al-Ahwāz) by way of a ford he had been shown, but rather than entering the village he camped outside it. He sent a message to the inhabitants. Their elders, along with those of al-Karkh, came to meet him. He ordered them to provide hospitality for himself and his companions, which was done as he wished, and he spent that night among them.

The next day one of the inhabitants of Jubbā offered ʿAlī a bay horse,[165] but he could find neither bridle nor saddle for it; thus he had to make do with a rope and a cinch of palm fibers.[166] He set out and

---

162. A village in the marshlands (baṭā'iḥ), not to be confused with a location of the same name north of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 50.

163. See nn. 139 and 156, above.

164. See Le Strange, Lands, 243. Situated to the east of the Dujayl, it was noted for its sugarcane.

165. Faras kumayt. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. k-m-t.

166. Halm, Traditionen, 30–32, considers that this description conveys an eschatological sense — referring to the horse without saddle and bridle belonging to the Mahdī.

finally reached a place called al-ʿAbbāsī al-ʿAtīq, where he secured the services of a guide as far as al-Sīb,[167] a canal upon which was situated the village of al-Jaʿfariyyah. The villagers were alerted to his [1754] arrival and fled. ʿAlī entered and settled in the house of Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān,[168] which was located in the market, while his companions scattered thoughout the village. They brought to him a villager they had discovered, and ʿAlī asked him the whereabouts of the Hāshimites' agents. The man said they were in the thickets [outside the village]. ʿAlī sent the one nicknamed[169] Jurbān to fetch their headman, Yaḥyā b. Yaḥyā al-Zubayrī[170] a mawlā of the Ziyādiyyīn. He was asked whether he had any money, and the man replied that he did not. So ʿAlī ordered him beheaded. Fearing now for his life, the man confessed to having hidden some money away; he sent for it and brought to ʿAlī the amount of two hundred fifty dinars and one thousand dirhams, the first such booty he had gained. ʿAlī next asked the headman about the animals owned by the agents of the Hāshimites, and he pointed out three pack animals, one a bay, one chestnut, and one gray. One was given to Ibn Salm, another to Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad, while the third was given to Mushriq the servant of Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. Rafīq rode upon a donkey, loaded with baggage. Some of the blacks discovered a cache of arms in a house belonging to one of the Banū Hāshim; they were seized. Al-Nūbī the Younger brought a sword, which the Zanj leader then gave to Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad. In this way there fell into the hands of the Zanj swords, spears, daggers, and shields.

That evening ʿAlī spent in al-Sīb, and in the morning he was given news of the arrival there of Rumays, al-Ḥimyarī, and ʿAqīl al-Ubullī. He despatched Yayāḥ b. Muḥammad with five hundred men, among them Sulaymān, Rayḥān b. Ṣāliḥ, and Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Nūbī the [1755] Younger. They engaged the enemy and routed them, seizing a galley[171] and arms in the process. After everyone had fled Yaḥyā b.

---

167. Yāqūt Muʿjam, III, 209; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 271, 274. The canal, which flowed through land [al-jawāmid, pl. of jāmidah "drained lands"] reclaimed from the swamps, itself finally disppeared into the great swamp, al-Baṭā'iḥ.

168. This refers to Jaʿfar b. Sulaymān b. ʿAlī al-Hāshimī; see Ṭabarī, III, 304–6.

169. See EI,[2] s.v. "Laḳab," on the meanings and application of sobriquets.

170. The reading of the nisbah is uncertain.

171. Sumayriyyah. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-m-r.

Muḥammad returned to ʿAlī and told him the news. Remaining in al-Sīb that day, he set out the following morning for al-Madhār,[172] after reaching a pact with the inhabitants of al-Jaʿfariyyah that they would not engage in hostilities against him or aid or protect any of his enemies.

ʿAlī then traversed the [canal] al-Sīb and made for a village known as al-Yahūd, which lay along the Tigris. There he again encountered Rumays with a contingent of troops. Fighting between them continued throughout the day. A number of Rumays's troops were captured, while many others received arrow wounds. A servant belonging to Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn who had been with Rumays was killed. A galley with an oarsman aboard capsized; the man was seized and beheaded. Leaving the field of battle, ʿAlī continued toward al-Madhār. He reached the canal called Bāmdād[173] and crossed over it and into an open plain, where he saw an orchard and a small hill, known as Devils' Mountain.[174] He headed for the hill, positioned himself on the top, and settled his troops in the plain below while preparing for himself a scouting party.

Shibl b. Sālim reported that he had acted as scout for ʿAlī along the Tigris. "I sent word to him," he said, "that Rumays was on the bank of the Tigris, looking for someone to convey a message for him." So ʿAlī sent off ʿAlī b. Abān, Muḥammad b. Salm, and Sulaymān b.
756] Jāmiʿ, and when they reached Rumays he said to them, "Convey greetings to your master, and tell him that he shall have safe-conduct to go anywhere without hindrance from anyone." In exchange, he should return the slaves (al-ʿabīd) to their owners (al-mawālīhim),[175] for which he would be paid five dinars per head. ʿAlī's men returned to him with Rumays's offer. ʿAlī became incensed at this and swore that he would come, rip open the belly of Rumays's wife, raze his home to the ground, and cause blood to flow everywhere. This response was duly delivered to Rumays, who then set off to station himself on the Tigris opposite ʿAlī's own camp.

That same day Ibrāhīm b. Jaʿfar al-Hamdānī[176] arrived to meet

172. The Nahr al-Madhār was the last reach of the easternmost course of the Tigris before it ran into the sea. The exact location of the town of al-Madhār is unknown; its surrounding district was called Jūkhā. See Le Strange, Lands, 42.

173. The reading is uncertain, an alternative being Bāṣdād.

174. Jabal al-Shayāṭin.

175. See n. 156, above.

176. One of ʿAlī's future commanders.

ʿAlī with correspondence for him to read.[177] It was only at that moment that he joined ʿAlī's side. Following the last evening prayer, Ibrāhīm told ʿAlī that he did not think he should head for al-Madhār. When asked what he should do then, Ibrāhīm said that, as the inhabitants of ʿAbbādān, Mayān Rūdhān, and Sulaymānān[178] had rendered allegiance to him, he should return there. And he added, "You have also left behind a group of the Bilāliyyah at the mouth of the Qandal and at Abrasān[179] waiting for you."

Now when the blacks heard of Ibrāhīm's advice, along with what Rumays had proposed to ʿAlī that day, they feared that ʿAlī would betray them and hand them over to their masters. Thus some of them fled, while the rest became very disturbed. Muḥammad b. Salm reported their distress to ʿAlī and the fact that some had taken off. So that very night ʿAlī ordered them to be assembled together. Separating the Zanj of the Euphrates [from the others],[180] he summoned an interpreter to announce that none of them would be returned to his owner. ʿAlī swore a most solemn oath on this, adding, "Some of your number should watch me closely, and, if they sense any treachery on my part, they could kill me." Then ʿAlī assembled the remainder of the Zanj together — namely, the Furātiyyah, the Qarmāṭiyyūn, the Nūbah, and others who understood Arabic — and made the same solemn oath to them as well, which he personally pledged and confirmed. Moreover, he said that he had not revolted to achieve earthly goods and glory, but only for the wrath of God and against the corruption and decay of the faith that he saw among the people. He concluded saying, "I shall share personally in every battle with you and assume the same risks as you." The Zanj were pleased by these words and wished him well. [1757]

At dawn the next day ʿAlī commanded one of the slaves of the Shūrajiyyīn named Abū Manārah to blow the horn, as a signal for the 177. Ibrāhīm appears here for the first time in Ṭabarī's account without an indication of who he is [an agent?] or even a comment on the nature of the correspondence he carries.

178. See Le Strange, Lands, 44. The abrupt nature of the information in this paragraph, without prior reference to it, suggests that Ṭabarī's work as we have it may have been abridged from a longer text. See n. 217, below.

179. The reading is very uncertain, Abūsān, Anūshār being among other possibilities.

180. The text of the Leiden edition has al-Furātiyyah, but the critical apparatus notes the uncertain status of the reading; other manuscript copies provide al-Qawāniyyah, al-Maghāribah, and al-Fazzāniyyah as alternatives.

Zanj to assemble. He then set out again for al-Sīb, where he found al-Ḥimyarī, Rumays, and the associate of Ibn Abī ʿAwn. ʿAlī sent a secret message to them with Mushriq, who later returned with their reply. The leader of the Zanj reached the canal, and the associate of Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn approached, greeted [ʿAlī], and said, "It is no fit reward for our master from you that you cause his administrative district to be despoiled, given what you know he did for you in Wāsiṭ."[181] ʿAlī replied, "I have not come here to fight you, so tell your troops to make way for me so that I may pass by you."

[1758] ʿAlī departed from the canal [al-Sīb] and made for the Tigris. Shortly thereafter soldiers arrived accompanied by the inhabitants of al-Jaʿfariyyah, all fully armed. Abū Yaʿqūb, who was known as Jurbān, approached them and said, "People of al-Jaʿfariyyah! You are well aware that you have given us your solemn oath that you would neither fight against us nor provide assistance to anyone against us; indeed, you swore to assist any one of us if he came to you." They raised a great clamor and din, shouting as they fired stones and arrows at Jurbān.

There was a place nearby where there were some three hundred zarnūqs,[182] which Jurbān ordered dismantled and tied together like rafts.[183] They were launched onto the water, each with a single fighter astride it, and in this way battle with the enemy was joined.

Someone said that before the rafts were constructed, ʿAlī b. Abān swam across the canal. When the rafts had been made, the Zanj crossed the canal. They moved away from the bank of the canal and engaged the enemy with swords, killing a great number of them. Prisoners were first threatened, then released. One of the slaves of the Shūrajiyyīn called Sālim al-Zaghāwī was sent to bring back the troops who had entered the village of al-Jaʿfariyyah. He called out to them, "Anyone caught stealing anything from this village or taking any captives will have to answer for his actions and will be subject

---

181. That is, the governor of Wāsiṭ, Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn, had been persuaded to release ʿAlī and his companions from custody. See p. 33, above.

182. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. z-r-n-q, describes them thus: two pillarlike structures constructed by the head of a well, across which is placed a piece of wood, from which the pulley for drawing water is suspended. The plural is zarānīq. See also Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CCLXXVII; and S. Fraenkel, Die aramaischen Fremdwörter im Arabischen, 134, who calls it a Wasseraufzug.

183. Al-shāshāt, although the vocalization is uncertain. From the context "raft" seems a likely approximation.

to a painful punishment." ʿAlī b. Abān then recrossed the [al-Sīb] canal from the west to the east bank. After regrouping his troops under their chiefs, he had just passed beyond the village by the distance of a bowshot when he heard a great uproar coming from the direction of the canal. Carefully, the Zanj made their way back. [1759]

When Rumays, al-Ḥimyarī, and the associate of Ibn Abī ʿAwn, who, having heard of the situation at al-Jaʿfariyyah, had arrived on the scene, the blacks attacked them and seized four galleys, together with their crews and fighters. The personnel were disembarked and ʿAlī b. Muḥammad summoned the fighters for interrogation. They informed him that Rumays and Ibn Abī ʿAwn's associate had not let them go before compelling them to march on him and that the villagers had urged on Rumays, promising the two men large sums of money. The Shūrajiyyīn guaranteed to pay the associate in return for their slaves the sum of five dinars each. ʿAlī then inquired about a certain slave called al-Numayrī and another called al-Ḥajjām. They replied that al-Numayrī was being held as their prisoner, while the local people said that al-Ḥajjām had taken to robbing and murdering throughout their district, although evenutally he had been [caught] and beheaded, his body having been strung up publicly on the Abū al-Asad canal.[184] After ʿAlī had gleaned this information, he ordered the prisoners beheaded, all that is save one called Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan al-Baghdādī, who swore that he had come with a safe-conduct, unarmed, and without hostile intent; he was set free. The severed heads and flags were borne away upon mules, while the ships were ordered destroyed by fire. ʿAlī then set out for Nahr Farīd, finally arriving at a canal named after al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad al-Qāḍī, across which stretched a dam lying between al-Jaʿfariyyah and the cultivated area (rustāq)[185] of al-Qufṣ.[186]

Villagers from the Banū ʿIjl welcomed ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, offering him their lives and extending generously to him whatever they possessed. ʿAlī returned their kindness, ordering them to keep what they had offered.

---

184. One of the major canals flowing into the estuary (fayḍ) of al-Baṣrah. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 303.

185. Spelled also as ruzdāq, ruztāq, and rusdāq, the word signifies a rural district consisting of cultivated lands with towns and villages. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. r-z-d-q.

186. A town between Baghdad and 'Ukbarā', but nearer the former, famous for its places of pleasure and entertainment, including fine wines. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 150.

[1760] He next proceeded to Nahr Bāqthā[187] and camped outside the village, which was on the canal itself and stretched along the bank of the Dujayl. The inhabitants of al-Karkh came to him, greeted him, prayed for his good fortune, and extended to him all the hospitality he required. A Jew from Khaybar called Māndawayh came to ʿAlī, kissed his hand, bowed before him, and then professed his gratitude for seeing him. Then he asked ʿAlī a number of questions, which he answered. The Jew claimed that he had found a description of him in the Torah and that he had foreseen fighting alongside him. He also queried ʿAlī about certain marks on his body, which he stated he knew about. The two men spent the evening discussing matters.

When ʿAlī set up his camp he [always] withdrew from his army with his six comrades. At that time wine[188] was not forbidden in his army. He had placed Muḥammad b. Salm in charge of watching carefully over the troops. Late that night one of the villagers of al-Karkh came and informed ʿAlī that Rumays, [leading] the inhabitants of al-Maftaḥ[189] and the adjoining villages, and ʿAqīl [accompanied by] the people of al-Ubullah, had arrived with fully armed Dabīlā.[190] Al-Ḥimyarī had also arrived that night with a group of Euphrates villagers at the Nahr Maymūn bridge, which they had destroyed to prevent ʿAlī's crossing. The following morning ʿAlī ordered it to be proclaimed to the Zanj to cross over the Dujayl. Then from the outskirts of al-Karkh he went to the Nahr Maymūn, where he found the bridge cut, with the enemy on the eastern side of the canal and gal-
[1761] leys containing the Dabīlā in the middle, while the villagers sailed in flat-bottomed vessels (jarībiyyāt) and reed boats (mujawniḥāt).[191]

---

187. The reading is conjectural.

188. Nabīdh. The word is a general term for various kinds of intoxicating beverages, which could be made from dates, raisins, barley, honey, or spelt. Nabīdh was considered synonymous with khamr, which is forbidden in he Qur'ān (2:219, 16:67, and 5:90, where it is described as the work of Satan). See EI,[1] s.v. "Nabīdh"; EI,[2] s.v. "Khamr."

189. See Le Strange, Lands, 48; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 299, 303; it was a village in the province of al-Baṣrah, lying between the city of al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ.

190. The critical apparatus of the Leiden edition notes, without supporting sources, that this was a group of Indian origin living in al-Baṣrah. See also Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CCXXXVI. The reference is probably to people from the Indian coastal trading port Daibul, located east of Mihran, who had extensive commercial links abroad. See Ibn Ḥawqal, Configuration de la Terre, II, 316.

191. On these types of rivercraft, see Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CLXII, CLXXII.

ʿAlī ordered his troops not to engage the enemy but to withdraw from the canal to protect themselves from arrows. ʿAlī retreated to a distance of about one hundred meters from the village. When the enemy saw that no one was about to attack them, a detachment left to make a reconnaissance. Now ʿAlī had commanded a group of his men to slip into the village and conceal themselves in ambush. When they spotted the enemy detachment, they attacked, and twenty-two prisoners were taken, while the remainder were pursued and a number of them were killed along the canal bank. They returned to ʿAlī with heads and prisoners and, after interrogating them, he had them beheaded as well. He ordered them to be guarded carefully, and for half the day their cries could be heard. A tribesman of the desert arrived seeking protection, and ʿAlī asked him about the depth of the river. The man told him he knew of a place that could be forded and informed him that the people were solidly against him and prepared to fight him. ʿAlī went with the man to the ford, about a mile[192] distant from al-Muḥammadiyyah, and he traversed the river with the rest of the company following behind him. Nāṣiḥ, known as al-Ramlī, supported ʿAlī, and he crossed over with the animals. Once on the eastern bank, ʿAlī turned again toward the Maymūn canal. Establishing himself there in the mosque, he gave orders for the heads [of the prisoners] to be planted on stakes. He remained there the whole day while Rumays's entire army traveled along the Dujayl and camped at a spot called Aqshā, opposite the Bard al-Khiyār canal.

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad sent out a scout, who returned with news of Rumays's location. Immediately, he despatched a thousand men to [1762] encamp on the salt marsh at the mouth of the [Bard al-Khiyār] canal, telling them to inform him if the enemy had not approached them by the time of the sunset prayer. He wrote to ʿAqīl, reminding him that he had formerly rendered him allegiance, along with a group of inhabitants from al-Ubullah. He wrote also to Rumays, reminding him of the pact that they had concluded at al-Sīb: that they would not fight each other and that he would send news of the central authorities to him. He entrusted these two letters to a peasant, after first exacting an oath from him to deliver them.

ʿAlī next moved from Nahr Maymūn and set out for the salt

192. One Arabic mīl equals two km., three mīl making six km., or one farsakh. See Hinz, Islamische Masse, 63.

marsh, where he had prepared a scouting party. Upon reaching the villages of al-Qādisiyyah and al-Shīfiyā, he heard a great commotion and saw shooting taking place; his practice when on the march was to give villages a wide berth. He commanded Muḥammad b. Salm to lead a party of men to al-Shīfiyā and ask the inhabitants to deliver to him the man who had murdered one of his troops as he was passing through. Muḥammad returned to inform ʿAlī that the villagers claimed they had no power to surrender the man, owing to his clientship with the Hāshimites and their protection of him. ʿAlī thus ordered his slaves to plunder the two villages, from which a great deal of currency in gold and silver, jewelry, ornaments, and gold and silver vessels were seized. On the same occasion slaves and women were captured, this being the first booty of its kind that they took. Muḥammad b. Salm's party happened upon a house in which there were fourteen Shūrajiyyīn slaves.[193] Their exit was blocked, and [1763] they were captured. The Hāshimites' mawlā who had murdered the Zanj soldier was brought, and Muḥammad b. Salm ordered him beheaded. The execution was carried out.

At the time of the afternoon prayer Muḥammad left the two villages and set up camp by the salt marsh called Bard al-Khiyār. One of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad's six companions came to him at the sunset prayer time and told him that his soldiers were indulging in inebriating drink,[194] which they had discovered in al-Qādisiyyah. Accompanied by Muḥammad b. Salm and Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad, ʿAlī went to inform the troops that intoxicants were not permitted, and from that day he declared wine (nabīdh) illegal. He addressed them saying, "You will be engaging armies in battle, so cease this indulgence in drink!" And they assented to his demand.

The following day one of the slaves of the blacks[195] named Qāquwayh came and told ʿAlī that Rumays's troops had set out for the eastern side of the Dujayl and proceeded toward the riverbank. The leader of the Zanj summoned ʿAlī b. Abān to advance with the Zanj and attack Rumays. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad then summoned 193. Ghilmān min ghilmān al-Shūraj. See nn. 139, 146, 156, above.

194. The text refers to khamr and nabīdh, both of which could loosely be rendered by wine. See n. 188, above. The context here clearly intends intoxicating drink, although nabidh (and likely khamr as well) could be prepared in both alcoholic and nonintoxicating versions. See Ibn Sayyār, Kitāb al-ṭabīkh, 309–10.

195. The expression is ghulām min al-sudān.

Mushriq to bring him an astrolabe,[196] with which he took a reading of the sun, in order to determine the precise time. Then he, followed by his troops, crossed over the bridge[197] spanning the Bard al-Khiyār canal. When they had arrived on the eastern side, they overtook ʿAlī b. Abān and found that the forces of Rumays and ʿAqīl were on the river bank, while the Dabīlā were aboard boats from which they could shoot their arrows. The Zanj forces attacked and killed a great number of the enemy. Then a gust of wind from the western shore carried the boats to the nearest bank, and the blacks fell upon them, [1764] slaying all they found aboard.

Rumays and those with him retreated to Nahr al-Dayr[198] on the Aqshā road. He abandoned his boats without moving them, leaving the impression that he was staying there. ʿAqīl and Ibn Abī ʿAwn's associate left in haste for the Tigris without paying heed to anything. The Zanj leader ordered that the contents be removed from the boats that carried the Dabīlā; they were joined one to another. Qāquwayh went down to inspect them and found one of the Dabīlā. He tried to force him out, but the man resisted. Then he rushed the man with a trumpet (ṣurnay)[199] he was carrying and struck him a blow on the shoulder, severing one of the veins. A second blow cut a tendon in his leg. Then Qāquwayh grabbed the man and struck him on the crown of the head, and he collapsed. Seizing the man's hair, Qāquwayh cut off his head and took it to the Zanj leader, who ordered that he be given a dinar.[200] Then he commanded Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad to make Qāquwayh commander of one hundred blacks.

Thereafter the Zanj leader headed for the village of al-Muhallabī,[201] which lay opposite Qayyārān. The blacks, who had meanwhile been pursuing ʿAqīl and Ibn Abī ʿAwn's deputy, returned. They had captured a galley with two oarsmen still aboard. ʿAlī b.

---

196. See EI,² s.v. "Asṭurlāb," on the uses of this instrument.

197. Qanṭarah. This type of bridge was an arched or vaulted structure built with baked bricks or stones. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. q-n-ṭ-r.

198. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 660, IV, 839, states that a monastery called Dayr al-Dihdar had stood here from the days before Islam. The canal was one of the major waterways emptying into the estuary of al-Baṣrah. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 303.

199. The reading is uncertain, but the meaning could be rendered either trumpet or bugle. See R. Dozy, Supplément aux dictionnaires arabes, I, 831, ṣurnay.

200. The expression is dīnār khafīf. See EI,² s.v. "Dīnār."

201. Written thus, the name does not appear in the Index and is otherwise unidentifiable. See n. 202, below.

Muḥammad asked the blacks for a report about it. They told him that, while [they were] chasing the galley, most of the crew had thrown themselves into the river and abandoned the craft, which they were then able to retrieve. ʿAlī then interrogated the oarsmen, [1765] who informed him that ʿAqīl had coerced them into joining him, as he held their wives prisoner until they did so; he had used the same tactic with all the oarsmen. On the question of the arrival of the Dabīlā, the oarsmen said that ʿAqīl had promised them money, and so they followed him. Concerning the boats stationed at Aqshā, ʿAlī was informed that they belonged to Rumays, who had abandoned them, fleeing at the first light of day.

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad then returned to a position opposite the boats [at Aqshā], and the blacks were ordered to bring them to him across the canal. The boats were then plundered and set on fire.

The Zanj next proceeded to the village of al-Muhallabiyyah, also called T.n.gh.t.[202] ʿAlī camped nearby and gave the order for the place to be plundered and razed, which was done. As he moved along the Mādiyān canal, he found quantities of dates, which he also had burned.

After these events the Zanj leader and his followers perpetrated outrages in this region, which we have not mentioned since none was especially atrocious, considering that every act he committed was atrocious.[203]

Among the momentous encounters that he later had with the forces of the central authorities[204] was one against the Turk Abū Hilāl in Sūq al-Rayyān.[205] One of the Zanj commanders called Rayḥān reported that this Turk had arrived in Sūq al-Rayyān at the head of a force of some four thousand men or more. They were preceded by a group of people wearing bright clothes and sporting flags and drums. The blacks led a ferocious attack against the Turk. One of the

202. Popovic, Révolte, 88, locates this village on Nahr al-Mādiyān [not found in the Index]; it is not to be confused with the similar place name mentioned in n. 201, above. The reading t.n.gh.t as an alternative designation is entirely conjectural.

203. By highlighting in his succeeding account only the major crimes and depredations of the Zanj, Ṭabarī is perhaps also pointing to a shift in their leader's policy toward plunder and destruction, rather than recruitment of forces.

204. The expression is aṣḥāb al-sulṭān, and Popovic, Révolte, 88 n. 3, observes that this almost certainly refers to a force of the local garrison and not to troops sent from Baghdad.

205. A large town on Nahr al-Rayyān in the region of al-Ahwāz.

blacks fell upon the people's standard-bearer, felling him with blows from the two cudgels he was carrying. The crowd fled, while the [1766] blacks pursued their onslaught on Abū Hilāl's troops, slaying nearly one thousand five hundred of them. One of the blacks chased after Abū Hilāl, who managed to save himself by escaping on a horse bareback. Then the darkness of night descended between the blacks and those who had escaped. In the morning the pursuit resumed, and the blacks returned with heads and prisoners, all of whom were then killed.

Following this engagement there occurred another involving the Zanj against the troops of the central authorities, in which ʿAlī b. Muḥammad was also victorious. According to what one of the Zanj leader's commanders[206] reported, the affair commenced as follows. The commander, whose name was Rayḥān,[207] said, "One night during the course of the year," (which we have mentioned was one in which his rebellion commenced) "ʿAlī b. Muḥammad heard the sound of a dog barking at the gates [of a dwelling owned by] ʿAmr b. Masʿadah.[208] He ordered an inquiry into the source of the barking and sent one of his followers to investigate. He later returned with the news that he had seen nothing at all, and then the barking resumed."

Rayḥān continued: "ʿAlī then called for me to go to the source of the barking, for it seemed as though the dog barked only at someone it could see. So I set out and suddenly came upon the dog, standing on a breakwater (al-musannah),[209] although I could see nothing else. And then I spied a man sitting on some steps. I spoke to him, and, when he heard me addressing him in Arabic, he replied, introducing himself as Sayrān b. ʿAfwiallāh. He said he had brought letters for ʿAlī b. Muḥammad from his partisans in al-Baṣrah; he had been one of his associates during ʿAlī's sojourn in al-Baṣrah. So I took him to ʿAlī, who read the correspondence he was carrying. ʿAlī asked

206. Qāʾid li-ṣāḥib al-zanj min al-sudān. Ṭabarī here seems to make a distinction between the Zanj as an ethnic/racial term and blacks (al-sudān) other than the Zanj.

207. Although it is not immediately apparent from the context here, this is the same Rayḥān b. Ṣāliḥ who has already appeared on p. 35, above, as one of the slaves of the Shurāfiyyīn.

208. Ṭabarī's editors identify this individual as ʿAmr b. Masʿadah al-Kātib al-Rāwī, about whom nothing else is known; see Index.

209. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-n-w(y).

[1767] Sayrān about al-Zaynabī and the numbers of men he had. He said that al-Zaynabī was mustering a large force of slaves, volunteers, and the factions of the Bilāliyyah and the Sa'diyyah, which was going to be despatched against 'Alī at Bayān. 'Alī told Sayrān to lower his voice lest the slaves be frightened by his news. He then inquired who was to lead this army and was told that one Abū Manṣūr, a Hāshimite mawlā, had been selected for the post. Asked whether he had seen this force, Sayrān replied that he had and added that they were also equipped with ropes to bind the hands of any blacks they captured. 'Alī then told Sayrān to return to the place where he was staying, and he wandered off to 'Alī b. Abān, Muḥammad b. Salm, and Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad and engaged in discussing matters with them until the dawn broke."

The Zanj leader then set out to spy upon this new force. When he reached the far side of Tursā, Barsūna, and Sandādān Bayān,[210] a detachment came out to do battle with him. 'Alī b. Abān was ordered to engage the enemy, and he routed them, capturing from among them one hundred blacks.

Rayḥān resumed: "I heard 'Alī b. Muḥammad say to his followers that what they had witnessed was one of the signs of perfection of their mission — that is, the arrival of the detachment with their slaves, who were surrendered into their hands, God increasing thereby the numbers of his own forces. Then the Zanj proceeded until they reached Bayān."

Rayḥān continued: "'Alī b. Muḥammad sent me, accompanied by a contingent of his troops to al-Ḥajar in search of transport boats [al-kārawān][211] and [the rest of] their army in the palm belt on the western side of the [Nahr] Bayān.[212] We reached the designated spot and [1768] there found one thousand nine hundred boats, protected by a detachment of volunteers. When they saw us they abandoned the boats and crossed over the Sulbān without their arms, heading toward Jūbak. We boarded the vessels and sailed them back to 'Alī's camp. Also aboard these craft were a number of pilgrims who had intended to follow the road to al-Baṣrah. When we arrived with the boats ʿAlī had a carpet laid out on a rise of ground, and, seated upon it, he examined the pilgrims for the rest of the day until sunset, by which time they had begun to believe all that he told them. They said that, if they had had any spare resources, they would remain with him; with that he sent them back to their boats. In the morning ʿAlī fetched them from the boats and made them swear not to reveal to anyone the size of his forces; indeed they should, if asked, make as little of his circumstances as possible. The pilgrims presented ʿAlī with one of their carpets, and he reciprocated, giving them one of his own. ʿAlī also asked them to swear that they were carrying neither money nor commercial goods for the central authorities. However, they indicated that one man was a government agent, carrying dried fruits to al-Baṣrah. The master of the boat in which the man was found swore to ʿAlī that he was engaged only in ordinary commerce, and so he was released. The pilgrims were also free to leave."

210. Although the location of these places cannot be identified, the action of the narrative is moving toward the environs of al-Baṣrah.

211. Arabized from the Persian kārabān. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CDXLII, s.v. qayrawān.

212. A broad artificial channel that joined the estuary of the Tigris with the Dujayl. See Le Strange, Lands, 44, 48.

The inhabitants of Sulaymānān appeared on the eastern bank of the Bayān opposite the Zanj, who were conversing with them. Ḥusayn al-Ṣaydanānī was among the inhabitants. He had been a close associate of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad in al-Baṣrah and one of the four persons who had declared their revolt in the ʿAbbād mosque. On this [1769] day Ḥusayn rejoined ʿAlī[213]

ʿAlī asked Ḥusayn what had caused him to be absent for so long. He replied that he had been in hiding and that, when this army had left [al-Baṣrah], he had joined in with the masses of troops. ʿAlī then inquired about the army, its composition and numbers. Ḥusayn said that he had seen the army depart and tht it comprised one thousand two hundred slave fighters,[214] a thousand of al-Zaynabī's own troops, about two thousand from the Bilāliyyah and Saʿdiyyah factions, and two hundred cavalry. However, when this force had reached al-Ubullah a dispute had broken out between the army and the town's inhabitants, and each side had begun cursing and abusing the other. The slave troops had even vilified Muḥammad b. Abī ʿAwn. Ḥusayn continued, "I left them behind at Shāṭiʾ ʿUthmān, and I reckoned that they should arrive in the morning." ʿAlī asked what they intended to do upon arriving. Ḥusayn replied that they were intending to send the cavalry into Sandādān Bayān, while their infantry would approach from both banks of the canal.

213. See p. 33, above.
214. Khawal. See n. 156, above.

The following morning ʿAlī sent out a scout to gather intelligence. He chose an old, feeble man, in order that attention would not be drawn to him. But the scout did not return. When he had been away a long time ʿAlī despatched Fatḥ al-Ḥajjām with three hundred men and Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad to Sandādān. He ordered Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad to pass through the market of Bayān. Fatḥ al-Ḥajjām reported to ʿAlī that the enemy was approaching en masse along both sides of the canal. ʿAlī inquired about the tide and was told that it had not yet come in. ʿAlī then observed that the enemy's cavalry could not have arrived as yet. He ordered Muḥammad b. Salm and ʿAlī b. Abān to lie in wait for them among the palm trees, while he occupied a higher vantage point on a hilltop overlooking them. Presently the [enemy] banners and foot soldiers came into view as they [1770] approached the territory of Abū al-ʿAlāʾ al-Balkhī, situated on a bend of the Dubayrān canal.[215].

The Zanj raised the battle cry "Allāhu Akbar" and then launched their attack on the enemy, confronting them at Dubayrān. The enemy's slave contingent attacked under the leadership of Abū al-ʿAbbās b. Ayman, who was otherwise known as Abū al-Kubāsh and Bashīr al-Qaysī; the Zanj were forced to retreat to the hill were ʿAlī b. Muḥammad was stationed. The Zanj then counterattacked and this time held their position firm. Abū al-Kubāsh assaulted Fatḥ al-Ḥajjām and killed him. He also surprised one of the black slaves called Dīnār and delivered him several blows. Next the blacks charged the enemy facing them on the shore to the Bayān and were engulfed in sword fighting.

Rayḥān resumed: "I encountered Muḥammad b. Salm when he struck Abū al-Kubāsh a blow, causing him to fall into the mud, where one of the Zanj came across him and severed his head. ʿAlī b. Abān, however, claimed Abū al-Kubāsh's death for himself, as well as that of Bashīr al-Qaysī. Chatting about that day, ʿAlī (b. Abān) said, 'Bashīr al-Qaysī was the first person I encountered, and we struck each other blows. His blow landed on my shield, whereas mine caught him squarely in the chest and abdomen. I had pierced his ribs and slit open his stomach. He collapsed, and I slashed off his head. Then I faced Abū al-Kubāsh, who gave me his full attention. One of the blacks came up behind him and struck his legs with a club, breaking them both. He fell and offered no resistance to my finishing him off and beheading him. I brought both heads to the leader of the Zanj.'"

215. The reading is conjectural.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Sahl said, "I heard the Zanj leader stating that ʿAlī had brought him the head of Abū al-Kubāsh and that of [1771] Bashīr al-Qaysī." Muḥammad added that he knew neither of them. Moreover, ʿAlī had told him that both men had been in the vanguard of their forces and, when he slew them, the troops had fled at the sight of their fallen leaders.

Rayḥān continued, according to what was reported from him, that the enemy fled using every avenue of escape while pursued by the blacks up to the Nahr Bayān. The water level in the canal had dropped, and, as the enemy attempted to cross, they sank in the mud, and most perished.

Some blacks passed by their comrade Dīnār, whom Abū al-Kubāsh had struck down. He was lying there wounded. The blacks mistook him for one of the enemy's slaves (al-khawal), and so they commenced to beat him with sickles, leaving him severely wounded. A passerby who recognized Dīnār carried him to the Zanj leader, who ordered his wounds attended to.

Rayḥān continued: "When the enemy had reached the mouth of the Nahr Bayān, they had lost many drowned and their boats with the animals aboard had been seized. Someone signaled us from a boat, and when we reached him he told us to enter the Nahr Sharīkān, where the enemy had set up an ambush. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad and ʿAlī b. Abān set out along the canal, Yaḥyā taking the western and ʿAlī the eastern side, when they came across about a thousand Maghāribah[216] troops lying in wait. Ḥusayn al-Saydanānī was being held their prisoner.

When the enemy saw us, they fell upon Ḥusayn and cut him to pieces. They then advanced upon the Zanj with their spears extended, and fighting ensued until the time of the noon prayer. The blacks in their turn threw themselves upon the enemy, slaying them all and seizing their weapons. The blacks returned to camp and found their leader sitting on the bank of the Bayān. Some thirty-odd 216. Government troops of North African origin.

flags and about a thousand heads had been brought to him, among them heads of the brave and courageous slaves (al-khawal). That same day Zuhayr was brought to him as well."[217]

[1772] Rayḥān continued: "I did not know him, but Yaḥyā, who arrived while Zuhayr was standing before the leader of the Zanj, recognized him and said to me, 'This is Zuhayr the slave (al-khawal); why should you spare him?' And the order was given for Zuhayr to be beheaded."

The Zanj leader remained in his camp that day and night. The following morning he sent a scout to reconnoiter the Tigris shore. The scout returned to inform him that there were two barges[218] moored to the island, which was then located at the mouth of the al-Qandal canal. When the afternoon [prayer] was finished the scout set out again for the Tigris, to ascertain developments. At sunset Abū al-ʿAbbās came to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad; he was his wife's brother and was accompanied by a soldier called ʿUmrān, who was married to the mother of this same Abū al-ʿAbbās. ʿAlī placed his troops on parade for them and requested that they [review them]. ʿUmrān handed him a communication from Ibn Abī ʿAwn, demanding that he cross over the Bayān and leave the district of his jurisdiction. For his part, Ibn Abī ʿAwn informed ʿAlī that he had removed the barges blockading the way out. ʿAlī gave the command to take the boats from Jubbā, which could traverse the Bayān. His troops went to al-Ḥajar[219] and found in Sulbān two hundred boats loaded with flour. The boats were commandeered; clothing, some barr.kanat,[220] and ten Zanj were discovered on board. The troops were ordered to embark upon the boats and, when the tide came in at sunset, he crossed over [the Bayān] with them opposite the mouth of the Qandal canal. One of the boats carrying flour, which was in the charge of Abū Dulaf, was [1773] blown off course by a strong wind. He arrived the next morning and reported to the Zanj leader that the wind had carried him as far as

---

217. The sudden introduction into the account of this individual, as if the reader were already familiar with him, suggests that the text we possess may contain lacunae or has been abridged. See Popovic, Révolte, 89; n. 178, above.

218. Shadhah, also shadhawah, a kind of war boat. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CCCVIII; Lane, Lexicon, s.v. sh-dh-w.

219. A location near al-Baṣrah.

220. Like Popovic, Révolte, 89 n. 5, I have been unable to identify this word, which is unvocalized in manuscripts B and O.

Ḥasak ʿImrān. There the villagers had shown an inordinate interest in him and the boat's cargo, and he had had to fend them off.

Fifty blacks joined ʿAlī's side, and, with their arrival and the acquisition of the boats, he entered the Qandal canal [district] and ventured as far as a village belonging to al-Muʿallā b. Ayyūb, where he set up camp. He spread out his troops up to Dubbā,[221] where they discovered three hundred Zanj, whom they brought back to ʿAlī. They also found an agent of al-Muʿallā b. Ayyūb, and, when they demanded money of him, he replied, "Let me cross over to Bursān, and I will bring you money." So he was released, and he went. He failed, however, to return, and when his absence became prolonged ʿAlī gave the order to plunder the village. And this was done.

Rayḥān continued this report: "On that day I saw the leader of the Zanj taking part in plundering with the rest of us. My hand and his fell at the same time upon a quilted woolen jacket; we each had hold of a part of it, tugging it toward us, when I finally let him have it."

Later ʿAlī b. Muḥammad set out for al-Zaynabī's garrison, situated on the western bank of the Qandal canal. The defenders were defiant, and, although they believed they could resist, they actually did not possess sufficient strength to do so, and all, some two hundred persons, were killed, to the last man. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad remained in the castle that night and set out on the morning tide for the salt flat of al-Qandal. His troops proceeded along both sides of the canal and, arriving at the village of Mundhirān, they entered and [1774] plundered it. A number of Zanj were found in the village, and ʿAlī had them apportioned among his commanders. From there ʿAlī reached the far end of the Qandal [canal] and directed his boats into a canal called al-Ḥasanī, which opened onto another canal called al-Ṣāliḥī, which led directly to Dubbā. He camped there on the flats.

One of his followers reportedly said that it was there that ʿAlī b. Muḥammad named his commanders, and he denied his having done so previously.

ʿAlī b. Muḥammad dispersed his troops among the canals until they converged upon the main square of Dubbā. They found there a man belonging to the harbor dwellers in al-Baṣrah who sold dried dates. His name was Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar al-Muraydī. He was brought to ʿAlī who, recognizing Muḥammad, greeted him. He asked him about the Bilāliyyah faction [in al-Baṣrah]. The man replied, "I was bringing you a message from them when the blacks met me and brought me to you. The Bilāliyyah are seeking certain conditions from you; if you grant them, they will follow and obey you." ʿAlī consented to the conditions. He also authorized the man to be responsible for them until they were able to reach him. ʿAlī then let Muḥammad go and sent with him an escort that would take him as far as al-Fayyāḍ[222] and then return. For four days the Zanj leader waited in vain for Muḥammad's return. On the fifth day ʿAlī disbanded the boats he had with him on the canal and proceeded by land between the canal called al-Dāwardānī and the Nahr al-Ḥasanī and the Nahr al-Ṣāliḥī. He had scarcely moved from one canal to the next, when he saw about six hundred horsemen approaching from the direction of the Nahr al-Amīr.[223] His troops hastened along the Dāwardānī, with the horsemen proceeding upon the western bank.

221. The name of one of the subdistricts of al-Baṣrah, through which ran many canals. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 544.

[1775] A lengthy discussion took place, and it transpired that the horsemen were Arab tribesmen, among whom were ʿAntarah b. Ḥajanā and Thumāl.

ʿAlī sent Muḥammad b. Salm to talk to ʿAntarah and Thumāl, and they in turn inquired who the Zanj leader was. Muḥammad pointed out ʿAlī, and the two Arabs said they wished to talk with him. Muḥammad returned to report to ʿAlī what they had said. He added, "If you would speak to them ...," but ʿAlī interrupted him abruptly and said, "This is a trap." He ordered the blacks to attack the tribesmen. When the blacks crossed the canal, the tribesmen turned away from them and raised the black flag.[224] Then there appeared in their midst Sulaymān, the brother of al-Zaynabī, who had been with them all the time. The Zanj troops returned, while the tribesmen withdrew. ʿAlī said to Muḥammad b. Salm, "Did I not tell you that they had set a trap for us?"

The Zanj arrived in Dubbā, and ʿAlī scattered his troops among the palm groves. They had found sheep and cattle, which they pro-

222. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 926, describes this as an ancient, broad canal in al-Baṣrah, with villages and cultivated fields along its banks.

223. A canal in al-Baṣrah (not to be confused with another of the same name in Wāsiṭ) dug by order of the ʿAbbāsid Caliph al-Manṣūr and thus originally known as Nahr Amīr al-Muʾminīn. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 835.

224. Indicating their support for the government.

ceeded to slaughter and gorge themselves on, spending the entire night there. The following morning they reached the narrow waterway (al-arkhanj)[225] called al-Muṭahhirī, which joined the Nahr al-Amīr opposite al-Fayyāḍ from both sides. There they encountered Shihāb b. al-ʿAlāʾ al-ʿAnbarī with a detachment of slaves (al-khawal). In the ensuing action Shihāb escaped with a small troop, but many of his forces were slain. Shihāb was pursued into the center of al-Fayyāḍ. There the Zanj came across six hundred slaves of the Shūrajiyyīn; they captured them and brought them to ʿAlī's camp, while their agents were killed. ʿAlī advanced as far as a castle called al-Jawharī, situated on the salt flats of the Barāmikah, and spent the night there. In the morning he reached the flats that began at the Dīnarī canal and the farthest reaches of which extended to the Nahr al-Muḥdath. ʿAlī reunited his troops and ordered them not to press on toward al-Baṣrah until the signal was given. Thereafter they were set loose to plunder the countryside, while ʿAlī spent the night there. [1776]

An Account of the Zanj Leader's Advance upon al-Baṣrah with His Army

After the Zanj leader had mustered his troops, they reportedly set out for al-Baṣrah from the salt flats stretching beside the Dīnārī canal, the farthest reaches of which extended to the Nahr al-Muḥdath. When they had arrived opposite the Nahr al-Riyāḥī, a party of blacks arrived and informed him that they had seen armed men in the al-Riyāḥī area itself. Moments later the Zanj assembled at a call to arms, and the Zanj leader ordered ʿAlī b. Abān to cross the canal against the foe, who were on the eastern side of the Dīnarī canal. ʿAlī b. Abān took about three thousand men with him while the Zanj leader collected together his remaining troops, telling ʿAlī [at the same time] that, if he required reinforcements, he need only ask for them. After ʿAlī b. Abān had left, the Zanj called for their weapons, for they had spotted another movement [of troops] from a direction different from the one ʿAlī had taken. The Zanj leader inquired about the troop movement and was told that they were coming from the direction of the village of al-Jaʿfariyyah, which lay be- [1777] side the Nahr Ḥarb. So he despatched Muḥammad b. Salm in that direction.

225. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CXI.

It was reported from Rayḥān (b. Ṣāliḥ), one of ʿAlī b. Muḥammad's followers, that he said, "I was among those accompanying Muḥammad (b. Salm) when we set out at the time of the noon prayer. We confronted the enemy in al-Jaʿfariyyah, and a fierce battle developed between us, which lasted until the late afternoon." The blacks next led a ferocious assault, forcing the enemy to turn heel and flee. Around five hundred persons were killed from among the soldiers, the Arab tribesmen, and the Baṣran factions of the Bilāliyyah and the Saʿdiyyah. Among the enemy that day was one Fatḥ, a slave of Abū Shīth, and he too fled, with Fayrūz the Elder in pursuit. When Fatḥ realized that Fayrūz could not be shaken off, he flung his metal helmet at him, albeit in vain. He next threw his shield at Fayrūz, but this also did not cause him to retreat. Finally, he heaved a metal oven[226] he had been carrying at Fayrūz, again without the desired effect. They reached the Nahr Ḥarb, and Fatḥ jumped into the canal and escaped, leaving Fayrūz to return to the Zanj leader bearing the weapons that Fatḥ had discarded.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan — Shibl said, "It was related to us that Fatḥ had leaped across the Nahr Ḥarb that day." Shibl continued, "I related this tale to al-Faḍl b. ʿAdī al-Dārimī, and he said that he had been with the Saʿdiyyah that day and that Fatḥ had not been carrying a metal oven[227] with him. In fact, he was wearing only a yellow-silk tunic. He fought until there remained no one else in the battle, and then he made his way to the Nahr Ḥarb and leaped across it to the western bank." He seems not to have known Rayḥān's story about Fayrūz.

[1778] Rayḥān said, "I met Fayrūz before he had returned to the Zanj leader, and he told me the story of his encounter with Fatḥ and showed me the weapons. The Zanj had resorted to recovering spoils as I made my way along the Nahr al-Dīnārī. Suddenly I came across 226. The expression is tannūr ḥadīd, which suggests an implement designed for battlefield conditions or a journey, as the common domestic tannūr was constructed of baked earth or clay. If the implement was shaped like the Beduin metal cooking implement, the sāj, round and concave as a shield, it could have easily been carried. This interpretation seems confirmed by another occurence of the term, at n. 374, below.

227. See n. 226, above.

a man sitting under a palm tree. He was wearing a silk hat (al-qalansuwah), red shoes, and a woolen tunic (al-durrāʿah). I seized him, and he showed me letters he was carrying, which he said were from a group of people in al-Baṣrah who had sent them with him. I threw a turban (al-ʿamāmah) around his neckand led him to the Zanj leader and reported the man's news. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad asked the man's name, and he replied, 'I am Abū al-Layth Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh from Iṣfahān, and I have only come to you from a strong desire to be in your company.' ʿAlī accepted him."

Moments later the cry "God is greatest" was heard, and ʿAlī b. Abān appeared in possession of the head of one of the Bilāliyyah called Abū al-Layth al-Qawārīrī (Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan — Shibl said that Waṣīf al-Zuhrī was the person who killed Abū al-Layth al-Qawārīrī, one of the celebrated members of the Bilāliyyah) and [in possession of] the head of another Bilāliyyah member named ʿAbdān al-Kasibī who had a voice among them, as well as the heads of a number of others from them. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad queried ʿAlī b. Abān about the incident, and he told him that no one had fought him more tenaciously than these two men, meaning Abū al-Layth and ʿAbdān. ʿAlī b. Abān forced them to flee and finally drove them into the Nahr Nāfidh, where they had a barge, which he capsized.

Muḥammad b. Salm later arrived with a prisoner from the Bilāliyyah whom Shibl had captured. His name was Muḥammad al-Azraq al-Qawārīrī. Muḥammad was also carrying a number of heads. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad called the prisoner over and asked him about the commanders of these two armies. The man replied that those in al-Riyāḥī were commanded by Abū Manṣūr al-Zaynabī and [1779] the others along the Nahr Ḥarb were commanded by Sulaymān, the brother of al-Zaynabī, who stationed himself on their rear flank in the outlying areas. To a query about their numbers, he replied that he did not know the figures, only that they were a considerable force. ʿAlī then had Muḥammad al-Qawārīrī released and attached to Shibl's group.

ʿAlī and the Zanj next made for the salt flats of al-Jaʿfariyyah. He remained there that night among the slain. The following morning he gathered together his troops and cautioned them [again] against their entering al-Baṣrah. Regardless, some of them, including Ankalwayh, Zurayq, Abū al-Khanjar — who had not yet been made a commander — Salīm and, Waṣīf al-Kūfī hastened on ahead. When they reached the Nahr al-Shādhānī, a number of Baṣrans came out to meet them, the number swelling quickly into a multitude. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad received news of this and sent off Muḥammad b. Salm, ʿAlī b. Abān, and Mushriq, Yaḥyā's slave, with a large contingent. He went along with them, accompanying the boats that were loaded with pack animals and the wives of the slaves. He established camp at the bridge on the Nahr Kathīr.[228]

Rayḥān continued: "I joined ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, having received a wound on my leg from a rock. He asked about developments and I told him that the battle was well underway. He then ordered my return and accompanied me until I reached the high ground overlooking the Nahr al-Sabābijah. He said to me, 'Go to our troops and tell them to disengage and fall back.' I told him that he should get as far [1780] away from the place as possible, for I was unsure of his safety from the enemy's slave troops. So he withdrew.

I myself went and informed the commanders of his orders, and they retreated. The Baṣrans pressed the Zanj hard, and a complete rout was the result. That happened in the late afternoon. Many fell into the Kathīr and Shayṭān[229] canals. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad called to his followers to come back, but they could not return. A number of them drowned in the Nahr Kathīr and many were slain on the canal bank as well as on the Shādhānī. Among the commanders who drowned that day were Abū al-Jawn, Mubārak al-Baḥrānī, ʿAṭāʾ al-Barbarī, and Salām al-Shāmī. The slave of Abū Shīth,[230] Ḥārith al-Qaysī, and Suḥayl caught up with ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, and together they mounted the arched bridge (qanṭarah) over the Nahr Kathīr. ʿAlī then turned back to [challenge] them, and they retreated before him until they were back on the ground.[231] On this day ʿAlī was wearing a woolen tunic, a turban, sandals, and a sword, and he carried a shield. When he had left the bridge, the Baṣrans mounted it again in pursuit. ʿAlī turned back and killed a man on the fifth step of the bridge. He called out to his men to alert them to his position, 228. A canal in al-Baṣrah named after Kathīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Salmī, who, as governor of the city, had it dug during the last years of the Umayyad period. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 843–44.

229. A canal in al-Baṣrah named after a client of Ziyād b. Abīhi, the Umayyad governor of Iraq. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 840.

230. Named Fatḥ; see p. 60, above.

231. That is, off the bridge.

but none of them remained in that spot save for Abū al-Shawk, Muṣliḥ, and Rafīq, Yaḥyā's slave."

Rayḥān said, "I was with ʿAlī b. Muḥammad at the time. He fell back to al-Muʿallā[232] and camped on the western side of the Shayṭān canal."

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said that he had heard the leader of the Zanj himself relate the following: "That day I had found myself at one point completely out of touch with my troops and they with me. Only Muṣliḥ and Rafīq remained with me. I was wearing a pair of Sindī sandals and a turban, a twist of which had become unraveled [1781] and trailed along the ground. I was in too much of a hurry to pick it up, as I was carrying a sword and shield. Muṣliḥ and Rafīq hurried ahead on foot, and as I lagged behind they disappeared from sight. I spotted two Baṣrans behind me, one carrying a sword, the other with a rock in his hand. They saw me and recognized me and redoubled their efforts to catch me, so I turned upon them and they backed off. I finally made it back to the spot where my troops were gathered. They had become perturbed at my loss, and seeing me again calmed them down."

Rayḥān continued: "'Alī b. Muḥammad returned to al-Muʿallā on the western side of the Nahr Shayṭān and camped there. He discovered upon inquiry that many of the men had fled and, after an inspection, he found there were a total of only five hundred men left. A horn was blown, the sound of which used to be the signal for the slaves to assemble, but no one returned. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad spent the night there, in the course of which Jurbān arrived. He had escaped in the general flight, taking with him thirty slaves. ʿAlī asked him where he had vanished to, and he replied that he had made a reconnaissance of al-Zawāriqah."

Rayḥān continued: "'Alī b. Muḥammad sent me to find out for him who was still at the Nahr Ḥarb bridge. I found no one around. The Baṣrans had plundered the boats that ʿAlī had brought there, removing the pack animals and taking possession of his other goods, his letters and astrolabes. The following morning, when ʿAlī b. Muḥammad inspected the troops again, he discovered that a thousand [1782] men had made their way back during the night."

---

232. Probably the same village as that belonging to Muʿallā b. Ayyūb. See p. 57, above.

Rayḥān said that Shibl was among those who had fled, but Nāṣiḥ al-Ramlī denied that.

Rayḥān continued: "Shibl returned [to camp] in the morning with ten slaves. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad rebuked him harshly. He demanded to know what had happened to a slave called Abū Naʿjah Nādir and another, ʿAnbar al-Barbarī. Shibl reported that they had both fled with the others. The leader of the Zanj remained stationed where he was and gave the order for Muḥammad b. Salm to venture to the arched bridge of the Nahr Kathīr and there preach to the people, informing them of the reasons for his revolt. Muḥammad set out, accompanied by Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ and Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad; they stopped [by the river] while Muḥammad crossed over and made his way into the midst of the troops of al-Baṣrah.[233] As he commenced to address them, they caught him off guard, fell on him, and killed him."

Al-Faḍl b. ʿAdī said that when Muḥammad b. Salm crossed the river to preach to the Baṣrans, they were assembled at a spot called al-Faḍl b. Maymūn. Fatḥ, the slave of Abū Shīth, was the first person suddenly to confront and strike him down with a sword; then Ibn al-Tūmanī al-Saʿdī severed his head. Sulaymān and Yaḥyā returned to report to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, who ordered them to say nothing to the Zanj until he had a chance to do so himself. Following the afternoon prayers, he announced the death of Muḥammad b. Salm to those troops who had not heard the news. He said to them, "Tomorrow you shall slay ten thousand Baṣrans to avenge him." He sent Zurayq and [1783] his slave Saqlabtūyā[234] with orders to prevent anyone from crossing the river. That was on Sunday, the 13th of Dhū al-Qaʿdah in the year 255 [October 23, 869].

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan — Muḥammad b. Simʿān al-Kātib: On Monday, the 14th of Dhū al-Qaʿdah [October 24, 869], the people of al-Baṣrah[235] assembled together and went forth in the wake of what they regarded as a triumph over the Zanj the previous day. The man

233. The expression is ahl al-Baṣrah, which could signify either the populace or troops; the latter seems preferable here. See n. 235, below. Clearly this incident did not take place in al-Baṣrah itself but rather on the outskirts of the city. See Popovic, Révolte, 92.

234. The reading is conjectural.

235. The expression once again is ahl al-Baṣrah. See n. 233, above. Here, however, Ṭabarī indicates a much broader participation in the expedition against the Zanj than just military personnel.

selected to lead the expedition was a Baṣran by the name of Ḥammād al-Sājī, a sailor experienced in operating and fighting from barges. The force comprised volunteers, archers, people from the main mosque, those from the Bilāliyyah and Sa'diyyah factions prepared to follow Ḥammād, and onlookers from the Hāshimites, Qurayshites, and other sections of the populace. Three barges were loaded with archers who crowded on board, eager to get to the scene of battle. A mob proceeded on foot, some bearing arms while others were mere spectators without weapons. The barges and boats entered the Umm Ḥabīb canal on the tide after sunset that same day. The procession of foot soldiers and spectators along the canal bank was so dense and numerous that they blocked from view everything in front of them. The Zanj leader had stationed himself on the canal known as al-Shayṭān.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said the Zanj leader told him that, when his scouts had arrived and he knew of the approaching crowd, he sent off Zurayq and Abū al-Layth al-Iṣbahānī with a detachment of troops along the east bank of the [Shayṭān] canal, and Shibl and Ḥusayn al-Ḥammāmī with another detachment along the western bank. Both parties were to set up ambushes. 'Alī b. Abān was ordered to take the remainder of his troops to intercept the enemy. They should, however, crouch down facing the enemy, guarding themselves with their shields, allowing no one to attack until the adversaries were close enough to brandish swords at them. When the situation had developed in this way, the Zanj attacked the enemy. The Zanj leader gave orders to the two ambuscades that when the throng [on the banks] were abreast of them and they heard their own troops on the attack, they should emerge on both sides of the canal shouting at the enemy. The Zanj women were ordered to gather bricks and keep the men supplied with them. [1784]

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said that after this incident the leader of the Zanj told his followers, "That day, as I beheld the mob approaching, I was gripped by a terrible fear, such an overwhelming terror that I appealed [to God] for help. I was accompanied by only a few troops, among them Muṣliḥ, and there was not one among us who did not imagine that he was going to meet his doom. Muṣliḥ marveled at the size of the multitude and I motioned to him to contain himself. As the enemy neared, I cried out, 'Oh God, this is the hour of trial, so come to my aid!' I had scarcely finished saying this when I saw white [1785] birds sweep down upon the enemy, and one of the galleys overturned, and all on board were drowned.[236] The barges met the same fate. My troops then fell upon the enemy they were heading for, shouting at them." The ambushers emerged from their hiding places on the canal banks behind the boats and the foot soldiers, clubbing those among them and onlookers on shore who tried to flee. A group here was drowned, a group there was killed, while others who fled toward the canal seeking rescue were overtaken by the sword. Those who resisted were slain, while those who ventured into the water were drowned. The foot soldiers on the canal's edge who sought escape in the water were either killed or drowned until most of the enemy forces had been annihilated. None but the odd fugitive was saved. The numbers of Baṣrans missing soared as their wives raised a chorus of lament.

People spoke of this day as the Day of the Barges (yawm al-shadhā).[237] They were horrified by the number killed that day. Among the innumerable host killed were a number of sons of the Hāshimite Ja'far b. Sulaymān and forty famous archers.

The abominable one[238] had the heads [of the slain] collected. He displayed them so that relatives of the deceased who came to him could claim those they recognized. For the rest, which no on claimed, he put aboard a flat-bottomed boat (jarībiyyah), filling it up. The boat was released on the falling tide from the Umm Ḥabīb [1786] canal, where it drifted toward al-Baṣrah, stopping at Mashra'ah[239] al-Qayyār. People came and recovered the heads of those they recognized.

After this day the enemy of God became ever more powerful as fear of him gripped the Baṣrans' hearts. They abstained from further battle with him, but the central authorities were informed of his escapades, and Ju'lān al-Turkī was sent with reinforcements to the 236. On this incident, see Halm, Traditionen, 26.

---

237. Shadhāh being the name of the type of vessel employed by the Baṣrans.

238. Ṭabarī suddenly changes his tone toward the Zanj leader, employing the epithet al-khabīth here for the first time. On the following page he calls him "enemy of God." Lane, Lexicon, s.v. kh-b-th, gives a rich variety of words to choose from, among them "base, corrupt, artful, cunning, and wicked"; "abominable one" has been used here consistently to render khabīth.

239. Mashra'ah, as part of the place name, signifies a place to which people come to drink or draw water, and where animals are also watered. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. sh-r-'.

Baṣrans. Ju'lān ordered Abū al-Aḥwaṣ al-Bāhilī to proceed to al-Ubullah as governor, sending as support a Turk called Jurayḥ.

The abominable one alleged that his followers had boasted to him in the wake of this [recent] battle that they had slaughtered the entire fighting force of al-Baṣrah save for the weak and incapacitated. "Give us permission to storm the city," they demanded. 'Alī b. Muḥammad berated them and decried their request. "On the contrary," he scolded, "get as far away from al-Baṣrah as possible; we have instilled fear and terror in them, and now you are safe. The thing to do now is forsake war with them until they come looking for you." Then he withdrew his forces to a salt flat at the farthest edge of the network of canals and then went on to the al-Ḥājir canal.

Shibl said that this place was the salt flats of Abū Qurrah, which lay between the Nahr Abū Qurrah and the Nahr al-Ḥājir. 'Alī b. Muḥammad stationed himself there and gave the command to his troops to construct huts from the reeds (akwākh).[240] These salt flats were surrounded by palm groves, villages, and cultivated fields. The Zanj soldiers spread out right and left, raiding the villages, murdering the farmers, stealing their property, and leading their livestock away. [1787]

Such was the news of 'Alī b. Muḥammad and of the people who were affected by his rebellion this year.

Al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. Abī Shawārib al-Qāḍī[241] was imprisoned on the 28th of Dhū al-Qa'dah (November 7, 869), and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nā'il al-Baṣrī was appointed to the judgeship of Sāmarrā in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (November 10–December 8, 869) of this year.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was 'Alī b. al-Ḥasan b. Ismā'īl b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī.[242]

---

240. See G. Young, A Reed Shaken by the Wind, for a modern account of life among the marsh Arabs.

241. See n. 6, above.

242. He had led the pilgrimage the previous year as well.

The Events of the Year 256

(DECEMBER 9, 869–NOVEMBER 28, 870)

Among the significant events of the year was the arrival in Sāmarrā of Mūsā b. Bughā. Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf was driven into hiding, while some of Mūsā's military commanders transferred al-Muhtadī under escort from the Jawsaq palace to the palace of Yājūr.[243]

It was reported that Mūsā b. Bughā entered Sāmarrā with those accompanying him on Monday the 11th of al-Muḥarram of this year (December 19, 869). Upon his arrival, Mūsā commenced a review of his troops, the left and right wings and the central sector presented [1788] together with their arms, which took place in al-Ḥayr, and continued up to the point where they reached the Gate of al-Ḥayr adjacent to the Jawsaq palace and the Qaṣr al-Aḥmar. This was on the very day that al-Muhtadī was holding a session of the court of appeal (maẓālim). Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil b. Fityān[244] was among those summoned to attend that day, because of the court. He was still there at the palace when the mawlas [of Mūsā b. Bughā] entered and took al-Muhtadī off to the palace of Yājūr. Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil followed and continued the court of appeal session, deputizing for al-Muhtadī, in the tent of Mufliḥ, until the business with al-Muhtadī was cleared up and he had been returned to al-Jawsaq and released.

243. The copyist of manuscript C reads for Yājūr the name of another Turkish commander, Yārjūkh.

244. The future Caliph al-Mu'tamid; see p. 115, below, for his accession date. His patronymic was Abū al-'Abbās, though he was also known by his mother's name, Fityān, or, according to Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, VII, 235), Qityān or Qinīn.

Bāyakbāk had been in charge of affairs in the caliphal palace and had been replaced a few days previous by Sātikīn. This was owing, people thought, to al-Muhtadī's confidence in him, which meant Sātikīn would also control both the palace and the Caliph's person at the moment of Mūsā [b. Bughā's] arrival. On that day Sātikīn remained in his own quarters, leaving the palace vacant. Mūsā arrived at the palace while al-Muhtadī was in session of the court of appeal; he was informed of Muhtadī's arrival but delayed giving him permission to enter for a while. When he and his company were finally allowed an audience, there first occurred a discussion like that on the day that [Mūsā's] delegation and messengers had arrived.[245] However, when such discussion became prolonged, the Turks began to mutter impatiently among themselves in their own tongue. Al-Muhtadī was then forced to leave the assembly and he was borne away on one of the animals of the Shākiriyyah, while the Turks plundered what was available in the Jawsaq palace in the way of riding beasts belonging to the elite. They then headed for al-Karkh[246] and upon reaching the Gate of al-Ḥayr in the fiefs attached to the palace of Yājūr, they brought him into the palace itself.

One of the mawlās who was present that day recounted the reason for their seizure of al-Muhtadī. One mawla had remarked to another that the delays [created by al-Muhtadī] were merely a device to allow Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf to take them by surprise with his forces. This prospect frightened them and caused them to remove al-Muhtadī to another spot. [1789]

245. As described p. 28, above.

246. This is the Karkh of Sāmarrā, also known as Karkh Fīrūz, to distinguish it from the southern quarter of Baghdad of the same name. It lay ten miles north of Sāmarrā. See Le Strange, Lands, 52; also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 17. The Caliph al-Mu'taṣim constructed al-Karkh beyond the built-up area of Sāmarrā, where the Turkish military personnel held lands [qaṭā'i'], in order to keep them separated from the ordinary population of the city and from certain other contingents of the army that were housed there. See D. Ayalon, "Preliminary Remarks on the Mamluk Military Institution in Islam," especially 55, quoting al-Ya'qūbī.

Someone reported that he had heard al-Muhtadī say to Mūsā, "What do you wish? Mercy on you! Honor God, and fear Him, for it is a momentous matter that you undertake." Mūsā replied, "We desire nothing but good. I swear by the grave of al-Mutawakkil, absolutely no harm will befall you from our part." The one who had overheard this remark was prompted to say to himself that, had Mūsā really sought only [the Caliph's] good, he would have better sworn on the grave of either al-Mu'taṣim or al-Wāthiq.[247]

When al-Muhtadī had been transferred to Yājūr's palace, the mawlās extracted vows and promises from him that he would not side with Ṣāliḥ against them and that he would not harbor toward them ulterior intentions different from the way he treated them openly. Al-Muhtadī agreed, and the mawlas renewed their oath of allegiance to him on Tuesday the 12th of al-Muḥarram [December 20, 869]. Later the same morning they sent for Ṣāliḥ to come to them for discussions, and Ṣāliḥ promised to appear.

One of the chiefs of the Farāghinah[248] reported that, when he was asked what they were demanding of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, he replied, "The blood of the government secretaries and their property and the blood of al-Mu'tazz and his entourage and property."[249]

The commanders accepted after pondering these matters, while their troops remained outside by the Gate of al-Ḥayr next to the palace of Yājūr. Then, on the Tuesday evening, Ṣāliḥ went into hiding.[250]

Ṭalmajūr recounted the following. "On the evening of Tuesday we assembled together with Ṣāliḥ. After he had ordered the distribution of periodic payments [arzāq] to those assigned to guard duty [aṣḥāb [1790] al-nawbah], he ordered one of the company present to review[251] the

247. Both al-Mu'taṣim and al-Wāthiq had died of natural causes while al-Mutawakkil had been murdered by Mūsā's father in league with Waṣīf, the father of Ṣāliḥ. For brief accounts of these events, see Kennedy, Age, 171–75; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 271–86.

248. A regiment of soldiers from the province of Farghanah, a large area lying on the north and south sides of the upper Jaxartes river. The region first supplied soldiers as guards for the Caliph al-Mu'taṣim [d. 227/842]. See Le Strange, Lands, 476–80, EI,[2] s.v. "Farghana."

249. Ṭabarī here means that the chief was seeking recompense for the blood of those mentioned, that is, vengeance. The Caliph al-Mu'tazz had been killed some five months previously.

250 That is, within a day of Mūsā b. Bughā's arrival in Sāmarrā.

251. On the formal procedures of the military review, see Bosworth, "Recruitment," especially 70–77.

number of troops at hand. That morning their number had been some five thousand. Returning to Ṣāliḥ, the man said that there were now only eight hundred men, most of whom were his freedmen (ghilmān and mawlas).[252] For a while Ṣāliḥ was silent, then he rose and left us without any further instructions. This was his last act."

It was reported from someone who had overheard that Bukhtīshūʿ (b. Jibrīl)[253] said, alluding to Ṣāliḥ before Mūsā's arrival, "First we roused this unruly force and incited them; then, when finally they did come to us, we were preoccupied with drinking and playing backgammon. It was as if we were here one moment, then just vanished when he (Mūsā) reached al-Qāṭūl."

In the early hours of Wednesday morning, Ṭughtā[254] arrived at the door of Yājūr's palace, where Mufliḥ confronted him and delivered him a blow with his battle-ax, striking him on the right temple. Those who remained with Ṣāliḥ the night he went into hiding included, from among the senior army commanders, the said Ṭughtā b. al-Ṣayghūn, Ṭalmajūr who was al-Muʾayyad's associate, Muḥammad b. Turksh, Khamūsh, and al-Nūshurī, while from among the ranking secretaries there were Abū Ṣāliḥ ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād, ʿAbdallāh b. Manṣūr, and Abū al-Faraj.[255]

On the Wednesday morning, which was the 13th of al-Muḥarram (December 21, 869), Ṣāliḥ had already gone into hiding, while Abū Ṣāliḥ made for the palace of Yājūr. ʿAbdallāh b. Manṣūr arrived there too with Sulaymān b. Wahb,[256] who disclosed to those present that he had drafts for five thousand dinars, which Ṣāliḥ had wanted him to handle. He refused to do so until the whole affair [concerning Ṣā- [1791]

252. On the interchangeability of these terms, see the discussion by Ayalon, "Preliminary Remarks," especially 51.

253. Bukhtīshūʿ was the name of a famous Christian family, originally from Jundaysābūr, which supplied a number of physicians to the caliphs throughout the third/ninth century. Bukhtīshūʿ b. Jibrīl died in exile in Baḥrayn in the year 256/870. His connection with Ṣāliḥ's forces is, however, unclear. On the family, see EI,[2] s.v. "Bukhtīshūʿ."

254. The reading is conjectural.

255. Abū al-Faraj was the son of Najāḥ b. Salamah, who had been in charge of the government department of the seal (tawqīʿ), with control as well over the fiscal prefects during the reign of al-Mutawakkil. In 245/858 both father and son were arrested and Najāḥ put to death; the property of both men was confiscated. See Ṭabarī, III, 1440–43; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 262–63, II, 733–34.

256. See Sourdel, Vizirat, II, 300–2. A former secretary of Mūsā b. Bughā, he was at this time al-Muhtadī's vizier.

liḥ and Mūsā] was settled. On this same day, Kanjūr was given a robe of honor[257] and entrusted with searching Ṣāliḥ's palace. Yājūr, Mūsā's associate, brought al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad from the palace of Ṣāliḥ, where he had been imprisoned.

On the same day of the month, Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir was made governor of Madīnat al-Salām and the Sawād. Robes of honor were sent to him, more indeed than had been bestowed upon ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.[258]

This same day as well al-Muhtadī was returned to al-Jawsaq, while ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād was sent to al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad.[259]

A public proclamation was issued against Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, and on the 22nd of Ṣafar [January 29, 870] he was killed.

An Account of Ṣāliḥ's Discovery in Hiding and His Death

The cause of this was as follows. On Wednesday, the 27th of al-Muḥarram of the year 256 [January 4, 870], al-Muhtadī publicly disclosed the contents of a letter. He said that Sīmā al-Sharābī claimed a woman had brought it from somewhere near al-Qaṣr al-Aḥmar and given it to Kāfūr, a eunuch [khādim][260] in charge of the harem. She had told him that it contained some valuable information and mentioned also where she lived, should anyone wish to make contact with her. The letter was then delivered to al-Muhtadī. When in fact it became expedient to question the woman about the letter, she was [1792] not to be found at the address she had given, and no one had any news about her.

It was reported that al-Muhtadī himself had discovered the letter but did not know who was responsible for delivering it.

Al-Muhtadī then summoned Sulaymān b. Wahb to attend him,

---

257. Khilʿah. This was generally not a single item of clothing but a variety of fine garments; see n. 447, below. See also EI,[2] s.v. "Khilʿa."

258. See p. 14 and n. 52, above. Here Sulaymān is officially awarded the position his brother had passed on to him.

259. Although Ṭabarī does not say so, the implicit sense here is that Ibn Yazdād was given permission to deal with al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad as he wished.

260. On this class of servant, see D. Ayalon, "On the Eunuchs in Islam," also EI,[2] s.vv. "Khādim," "Khaṣī."

along with a group of the mawlas, among whom were Mūsā b. Bughā, Muflih, Bāyakbāk, Yājūr, Bakālabā, and others. He showed the letter to Sulaymān and asked him if he recognized the handwriting. Sulaymān replied that it was the hand of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, whereupon al-Muhtadī ordered Sulaymān to read the letter to the assembled company.

Ṣāliḥ stated in it that he had gone to ground in Sāmarrā. He had done so preferring safety for himself but also to spare the mawlas and in fear that skirmishes between them might erupt into full-scale hostilities. His intention was that everyone should sleep on the matter, so that whatever happened would be after reflection upon what he had set out in his letter. Ṣāliḥ went on to detail what he had seized of the secretaries' property. He said that al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad had that information, and he was one of the secretaries still in their custody. Next he noted who had delivered money to him and to whom he had entrusted its distribution. He remarked upon the affair of Qabīḥah and indicated that information on that was possessed by Abū Ṣāliḥ b. Yazdād and Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAṭṭār. Among other matters that he touched upon Ṣāliḥ attempted to justify his behavior for certain actions, while apologizing for others. In any event, his words expressed the strength of his feelings.

When Sulaymān had finished reading the letter, al-Muhtadī followed by urging upon the company reconciliation, harmony, and agreement, as he sought to stimulate an aversion for dissension, mutual hatred, and destruction. This only caused them to suspect that al-Muhtadī knew of Ṣāliḥ's whereabouts and that he might deliver them into [Ṣāliḥ's] hands. This suspicion created much discussion among them and lengthy examination of the matter. On Thursday morning, the 28th of al-Muḥarram 256 (January 5th, 870), the Turkish commanders went together to the residence of Mūsā b. Bughā inside the Jawsaq compound, muttering and discussing matters among themselves. News of this reached al-Muhtadī. [1793]

Aḥmad b. Khāqān al-Wāthiqī reported that he had been the one to bring this news to al-Muhtadī's attention. He said that he had heard someone present at the meeting of commanders say, "The troops are unanimous in their decision to depose this man." Aḥmad continued: "I went to his brother Ibrāhīm [al-Muwaffaq] and informed him of developments, and he in turn passed on the information from me to al-Muhtadī. I nevertheless feared that the Commander of the Faithful might hasten to inform the Turks about me; but God granted me security."

Aḥmad reported further that the brother of Bāyakbāk addressed the assembly[261] once they had disclosed to him the course of action they had decided upon. He said: "You have slain the son of al-Mutawakkil, who was handsome, generous, and kind, and now you want to murder this man, who is a good Muslim who fasts, does not drink forbidden wine (nabīdh), and had done no wrong. By God, if you do kill him, then I shall take off for Khurāsān and spread notice of this whole affair of yours far and wide."

When news of this meeting reached al-Muhtadī, he entered his audience chamber girt with sword, dressed in clean robes, and perfumed. He then summoned the Turks into his presence, but for a while they refused. When finally they stood before him he said to them, "I have heard what you intend to do with me. I am not like my predecessors, such as Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Musta'īn, or even like the son of Qabīḥah. By God, I have not come to confront you without being prepared to die. I have already entrusted my brother [1794] with my son to succeed me. This is my sword, and by God I shall fight with it so long as I can hold onto it. And by God, if one hair of my head is touched, the lot of you shall surely perish. Have you no religion? Have you no shame? Have you no piety? How long will this dissension against the caliphs, this boldness and effrontery against God, go on? It is all the same to you whether one wants to spare you or, hearing such a tale as this about you, calls for gallons of drink to celebrate joyously your misfortune and rejoices in your ruin! Tell me from what you yourselves know: Are you aware of any of this wealth of yours that has reached me? You, O Bāyakbāk, don't you realize that just one of your company is more fortunate than all of my own family? If you really want to know, just take a look! Will you see in any of their residences furniture, servants, and slaves or whether they possess estates and revenues (ghallāt)?[262] Fie on you! And now

261. This meeting, according to Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, VII, 219), took place in the apartment of Mūsā b. Bughā, which was located in the Jawsaq palace. Ibn al-Athīr, however, puts the words into the mouth of Bābakiyāl, rather than Bāyakbāk's brother.

262. The word ghallah (pl. ghallāt) means the produce, revenue, or income from a wide variety of sources: produce of the land or income from its rent, rental of a house, or hire of a slave. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. "gh-l-l."

you come and say that I know what Ṣāliḥ is up to! Is he not just another mawlā like yourselves? How then would I put up with him, if you all think ill of him? If you should choose to make peace, that is what I heartily desire for all of you. But, if you persist in pursuing this course, that is your business.[263] Seek out Ṣāliḥ, and satisfy your blood lust! But, as for myself, I have no knowledge of his whereabouts."

They demanded that he swear an oath upon that, to which al-Muhtadī replied, "I will give you my right hand on it, but I shall postpone doing so until tomorrow when I perform the Friday prayers in the presence of the Hāshimites, religious judges, conciliators, and other men of rank."

The Turks seemed to relent a little at this. Al-Muhtadī sent for the Hāshimites, and they arrived in the evening. When al-Muhtadī gave them permission to enter and greetings were exchanged, he made no mention to them of these matters and simply ordered them to be at the palace for the Friday prayers, and they departed. The next morning, Friday, they (the Turks) had made no move. Al-Muhtadī performed his prayers; everyone was calm and departed in peace. [1795]

Someone who had overheard the quarrel on Wednesday reportedly said that, when Ṣāliḥ had been denounced as a traitor, al-Muhtadī had observed that Bāyakbāk had also been around when Ṣāliḥ was embroiled in the affair of the secretaries and the wealth of Qabīḥah's son (al-Mu'tazz). Thus, if Ṣāliḥ had gained anything from the business, Bāyakbāk must have profited as well. This remark infuriated Bāyakbāk.

Someone else who had heard this remark reported that al-Muhtadī had also observed that Muḥammad b. Bughā, too, had been around and was fully cognizant of what had happened and indeed had participated in the whole affair. This gibe provoked Abū Naṣr (Muḥammad b. Bughā's) anger.

It has been said that for a long time[264] the Turkish commanders held their counsel about the insult implicit (in al-Muhtadī's words) but that in their hearts they harbored rancor against him, though they were prevented from doing anything from fear of disorder and the lack of financial resources. When, however, the revenue arrived

263. That is, "I won't try to stop you."
264. Literally, from the time of the age of Moses.

from Fārs and al-Ahwāz on Wednesday, the 27th of al-Muḥarram (January 4, 870), they were roused to action. The total amount of these revenues was 17.5 million dirhams.

On Saturday, news spread among the populace that the army was about to depose and murder al-Muhtadī, an end they sought by provoking him to anger. They had leaflets written and distributed in the congregation mosque and in the streets. Someone who claimed to have read one said it contained, in part, the following words:

> In the name of God the Compassionate, the Merciful. O community of Muslims! Pray to God for your Caliph, the just, the favored, the second ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. Pray that God grant him victory over his enemies, that He spare him the trouble of [enduring] his oppressor, and that He fill him > [1796] and this community with bounty by extending his life. The mawlās have been urging al-Muhtadī to abdicate, and for some days he has been submitted to torture. Those conducting this campaign are Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Thawābah and al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad. May God show mercy upon those with pure intentions and pray for Muḥammad (may the peace and blessings of God be upon him).

On Wednesday, the 4th of Ṣafar of this year (January 11, 870), the mawlās in al-Karkh and al-Dūr[265] became agitated. They despatched a spokesman, ʿĪsā, to tell al-Muhtadī that they needed to discuss certain matters with him. They requested that the Commander of the Faithful send one of his brothers to them. So al-Muhtadī sent his oldest brother, Abū al-Qāsim ʿAbdallāh, along with Muḥammad b. Mubāshir al-Karkhī, and they set out to inquire what was troubling the mawlās. First, the mawlās professed their obedience and loyalty to the Commander of the Faithful. They had heard that Mūsā b. Bughā, Bāyakbāk, and a number of their commanders were seeking to depose al-Muhtadī. While they would freely sacrifice their lives, they would not do so for that.

The mawlās continued, saying that they had read the leaflets distributed in the main mosque and in the streets. In this regard they complained of their straitened circumstances, the delay [in the payment of their] allotments, and the damage done to estates and the land tax as a result of the commanders' acquisition of fiefs (iqṭā').[266] Moreover, most of the revenue from the land tax had been swallowed up by their chiefs and their bonuses and extras from previously established practices, as well as allotments for women and other interlopers.[267] They talked at length in this vein. Abū al-Qāsim 'Abdallāh b. al-Wāthiq finally said to them, "Write all this down in a letter to the Commander of the Faithful, and I will ensure that it is delivered to him on your behalf." So a letter was drafted. The secretary [1797] responsible for writing it was Muḥammad b. Thaqīf al-Aswad, who acted as a secretary for 'Īsā, on occasion master of al-Karkh.

265. Another settlement for the Turkish soldiery, lying farther to the north of al-Karkh. See Le Strange, Lands, 52.

Abū al-Qāsim and Muḥammad b. Mubāshir left and delivered the letter of al-Muhtadī, who replied in his own hand, sealing the letter with his own seal. On the following morning Abū al-Qāsim went to al-Karkh, where he met the mawlās. They went together to the palace of Ushnās, which had been turned into a congregational mosque for them. In the public square they halted, the assembled mawlās comprising some one hundred fifty cavalry and about five hundred infantry. Abū al-Qāsim read out Muhtadī's greetings to them, saying, "The Commander of the Faithful says that this is his personal letter to you, written and sealed by himself, so listen to it, and weigh carefully what it says." Abū al-Qāsim then handed the epistle to their secretary, who read it out:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Praised be God, and His manifold blessings be upon Muḥammad the Prophet and his family. May God guide us and you rightly, and be to us and to you both friend and protector. I have taken note of your message and rejoice in your expression of loyalty and obedience. May God reward you and protect you well. It distresses me greatly to hear of your misery and your needs. By God, would that I could arrange for your welfare by eating and feeding my children and household only the necessary minimum amount of food and clothing my children only in what suffices to hide their modesty. But

266. See EI,[2] s.v. "Iqṭā'."

267. The system of military payments was open to abuse by the commanders' inclusion in the registers of persons not entitled to such stipends. The formal military reviews were occasions intended to weed out such interlopers (al-dukhalā), although this did not always work in practice. See Bosworth, "Recruitment," especially 71.

no, by God! May He protect you! Since I accepted rule over you, I have had only fifteen thousand dinars for my own needs and those of my household, children, servants, and retinue. You have access to what [amounts] have arrived and shall arrive, and everything has been disbursed to you with [1798] nothing held back. As for what you mention hearing and reading about in the leaflets distributed in the mosques and streets and about your unstinting service, this is indeed worthy of you. So why apologize for bringing the matter up? We and you are as one. May God compensate you well for your pledges and your fidelity. But the situation is not as you have heard; knowing this, act accordingly, God willing. As for what you mention about fiefs, bonuses, and other matters, I shall examine these questions and, God willing, shall earn your affection in doing so. Peace be upon you. May God rightly guide us and you, and be protector to us both. Praised be God, Lord of the worlds. Manifold blessings be upon Muḥammad the Prophet and his family.

When the man who was reading the letter reached the point where al-Muhtadī had said that he had only received a sum of fifteen thousand dinars, Abū al-Qāsim motioned to the man, and he stopped. And then he [Abū al-Qāsim] said, "What is this [paltry sum]? During his reign, the Commander of the Faithful has deserved more than this amount for a shorter period for [expenditure] on his allotments, provisions, and assistance. Surely you know what previous caliphs have spent on gifts for effeminates, singers, musicians, building villas and such like! So pray to God for the Commander of the Faithful!"

The man resumed reading the letter, and when he had finished there was much discussion. Then the mawlās made a statement of their own. Abū al-Qāsim replied, advising them to express their views in a letter, commencing it in the customary manner of correspondence to caliphs and addressing it from "the commanders, their deputies, and chiefs[268] in al-Karkh, al-Dūr and Sāmarrā."

They did so, first praying to God for the Commander of the Faithful. Then they requested the following: that all matters pertaining to rank, both high and low, be referred back to the Commander of the Faithful without interference from anyone else; that arrangements of military administration revert to what they had been in the days of al-Musta'īn, namely, that every nine men be under a chief,[269] every fifty men under a deptuy (khalīfah), and every hundred men under a commander (qā'id); that women, extras, and bonuses be excised from the register; that a mawlā not be included as part of a qabālah contract[270] or any other; that they be paid regularly every two months; that the practice of granting the fiefs be discontinued; and, finally, that the Commander of the Faithful be able to increase [the pay] of whomsoever he wished and promote whom he liked. [1799]

268. Al-quwwād wa-khulafā'ihim wa-al-'urafā'. For the use of these ranks, see p. 79, below.

The mawlās added that immediately following their letter they were going to proceed to the residence of the Commander of the Faithful and remain there until their needs were met. Moreover, if they heard of anyone interfering with him concerning these matters, they would have his head. If anyone touched a hair of the Commander of the Faithful's head, they would kill Mūsā b. Bughā, Bāyakbāk, Mufliḥ, Yājūr, Bakālabā, and others. And with that they prayed to God for the Commander of the Faithful.

They gave the letter to Abū al-Qāsim and he departed and delivered it. In Sāmarrā the mawlās became unsettled and the commanders very disturbed. Al-Muhtadī had already taken his seat in the court of appeal, and the jurists and judges were allowed to enter and take theirs. The commanders stood according to their ranks while Abū al-Qāsim entered ahead of the plaintiffs. Al-Muhtadī read the letter and withdrew with Mūsā b. Bughā. The caliph next ordered Sulaymān b. Wahb to endorse their copy of the letter, approving what they had requested. When Sulaymān had done this in a paragraph or two, Abū al-Qāsim said, "O Commander of the Faithful,

269. 'Ārif. As a term applied to certain military and civilian offices, see EI,² s.v. "'Ārif."

270. On the nature of the juridical term "guarantee" as used in the practice of fiscal contracts, see EI,² s.v. "Ḳabāla"; Sourdel, Vizirat, II, 585–86. Military commanders sought such contracts in anticipation of benefits accruing from speculation on the differential between the sum contracted by a guarantor with the central treasury and the amount the guarantor was actually able to collect from taxes levied on the harvest. Here the intention seems to be a limitation of the abuse of the system by exclusion of mawlās as guarantors. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 222, however, has lā yudkhal mawlā fī mālihi, which suggests that mawlās were not to be included as part of their commanders' property. Neither reading provides an entirely satisfactory understanding of the passage.

only your endorsement in your own hand will satisfy them." So al-Muhtadī took the paper and struck out what Sulaymān had written, endorsing each article of their requests with his approval, stating that each would be fulfilled. He then composed a separate communi-[1800] nication in his own hand, sealing it himself, and gave it to Abū al-Qāsim. The latter spoke to Mūsā, Bāyakbāk, and Muḥammad b. Bughā, "Send messengers accompanying me to them, to plead your excuses before them concerning what has reached them about you." So each of them appointed a man to go along with Abū al-Qāsim. He found the mawlās assembled in their usual places, numbering around a thousand cavalry and three thousand infantry. The time was noon on Thursday, the 5th of Ṣafar (January 12, 870) of this year.

He read to them greetings from the Commander of the Faithful, saying, "The Commander of the Faithful has responded to everything you have asked for. So pray to God for him." He handed the letter over to their secretary who first read out al-Muhtadī's endorsements, then read them the second letter from the caliph. It went as follows:

> In the name of God the Compassionate, the Merciful. Praised be God, He alone. God's blessings and peace be upon Muḥammad the Prophet and his family. May God guide you aright and protect you. May He give you plenty and restore your circumstances and through you and by means of you those of Muslims as well. I have taken note of your despatch and I also read it to your chiefs. They reported the same things as you have and have asked for the same things as you have. I have already consented to everything that you requested, out of love for your welfare and friendship, and to rally your support. I have ordered your allotments to be so stipulated that they will accrue to you on a regular basis; thus, there is no need for you to be unsettled. Be of good heart. Peace! and may God guide you aright and protect you; may He provide you with plenty and restore your circumstances and, through you and by means of you, those of Muslims as well.

When the man reading the letter had finished, Abū al-Qāsim said to them, "These men are messengers from your chiefs who have come to plead their excuses before you for what you may have heard about them. They say that your are all brothers and belong to each other." Then the messengers spoke along the same lines. The mawlās themselves engaged in lengthy discussion and at the end of it drafted a [further] communication to the Commander of the Faithful, setting forth in it the same kind of justification as they had in their first letter. They dissociated themselves from what they had [1801] asserted in the previous communication. Now, they would be satisfied with nothing less than the Caliph's endorsement of five points. These were to reduce the increases; the restoration of fiefs to their former conditions [of tenure]; the demotion of mawlās who were gatekeepers from the status of the "elite" to that of the lower-ranking palace guards (barrāniyyīn);[271] reversion to the military administrative practices of the days of al-Mustaʿīn; and, finally, restoration of talājī properties,[272] so they could be placed in control of someone to whom were attached fifty men from the troops of al-Dūr and fifty from Sāmarrā, all of which could be successfully carried out by the dīwāns. In addition, the Commander of the Faithful should turn over the army to one of his brothers, or someone else [of his choice] who could act as intermediary between them in their affairs; but this person should not be from among the ranks of the mawlās. Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf and Mūsā b. Bughā should each be held responsible for his wealth. Thus, nothing would content them short of having all the requests in their communications dealt with; this, as well as having their pay (al-ʿaṭā') expedited, their regular pay (arzāq)[273] being made every two months. The mawlās also informed the Caliph that they had written to the troops of Sāmarrā and the Maghāribah troops to join them, and that they would be going to the residence of the Commander of the Faithful to seek fulfillment of their demands.

271. Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CXXX.

272. Dozy, Supplément, II, 524. These properties referred to ownership of land ceded to another person, who undertook to protect the original owner's right to work the land; see also Lane, Lexicon, s.v. l-ǧ-', for a variant meaning.

273. The difference between the two terms for pay or stipend, as explained by Lane, seems to be founded upon the time between payments; whereas, for example, the 'aṭā' could be an allowance paid once a year, the rizq (pl. arzāq) was paid more frequently, the period stipulated being two months. In both instances payment appears to have been made both in money and in provisions and equipment. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ʿ-ṭ-w. The word 'aṭā', which means "gift," was originally applied to pensions paid to Muslims and then became the term for troops' pay, where it could also be an ad hoc payment. See EI,[2] s.vv. "'Aṭā'," "Djaysh."

Their letter of demands was given to Abū al-Qāsim, the Caliph's brother. Meanwhile they wrote another to Mūsā b. Bughā, Bāyakbāk, Muḥammad b. Bughā, Mufliḥ, Yājūr, Bakālabā, and the other commanders, reporting their communication with the Caliph, and its contents.

[1802] They noted, moreover, that the Commander of the Faithful had accepted their request so long as the commanders did not interfere with his decisions; were the commanders in fact to do so and oppose the mawlās, then no agreement could be arranged with them on anything. The letter added that, if the Commander of the Faithful were wounded or if a hair of his head was disturbed, they the mawlās would have the heads of all of them. They would now only be satisfied with the reappearance of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf who would, together with Mūsā b. Bughā, examine the matter of the whereabouts of the [disputed] wealth; for before he vanished Ṣāliḥ had promised to pay them their allotments (arzāq) for six months.

This letter was given to Mūsā's messenger, while the mawlās despatched several of their colleagues with Abū al-Qāsim to deliver the other letter to the Commander of the Faithful and to await his response.

When Abū al-Qāsim returned, Mūsā sent some five hundred horsemen to stand by the al-Ḥayr Gate situated between al-Jawsaq and al-Karkh. Abū al-Qāsim turned aside to them along with the soldiers' messengers and those of Mūsā's forces. Mūsā's messenger gave him the mawlās' letter intended for himself and his associates. Among this group were Sulaymān b. Wahb and his son, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Thawābah, and some other secretaries. When Mūsā had read the letter to them, Abū al-Qāsim said that he bore another letter from the mawlās, this one of the Commander of the Faithful; he did not, however, disclose it to them. They then all rode off together to al-Muhtadī whom they found seated on a carpet in the sun, having just finished his prayers. In the palace he had destroyed every musical instrument and gadget of pleasure and amusement. Once the letters were delivered, he was left alone for a while. Later, he instructed Sulaymān b. Wahb to compose replies to the matters raised by the mawlās in five brief notes. Al-Muhtadī passed these on, enclosing them in a letter of him own, and gave [the roll] to his brother.

The commanders also composed a reply to the mawlās and gave it to Mūsā's associate. By sunset Abū al-Qāsim had returned to the Turks with al-Muhtadī's greetings and he read out to them the Caliph's letter: [1803]

> In the name of God the Compassionate, the Merciful. May God find us worthy to obey and please Him. I have noted your letter, May God protect you. I have sent to you the five endorsements meeting the terms that you stipulated. So now delegate agents to those in the government bureaus who will successfully execute the promises, God willing. As for your request to turn your affairs over to one of my brothers so that your news may be brought to my attention and your needs conveyed to me, by God I would have been content to review these matters personally, and observe every matter that concerns your welfare. However, I shall, God willing, select for you one of my brothers or someone else suitable, as you have asked for. But do keep me informed as to your needs and also what you deem appropriate for yourselves, and I shall do what I can to meet your wishes. God willing. May God find us worthy to obey and please Him.

Then Mūsā's messenger delivered the epistle from Mūsā and his colleagues. In it he said:

> In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. May God preserve and keep you, and perfect His bounty upon you. We have noted your letter. You are brothers to us and our cousins, and we are set upon meeting what you desire. The Commander of the Faithful, may God strengthen him, has ordered your wishes in all that you seek to be dealt with, and he has sent the endorsements concerning them to you. As for the matter you mention concerning Ṣāliḥ, the mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, and our change of attitude toward him, [be assured that he is to us] as a brother and cousin, and we did not seek anything on this matter that you would find objectionable. If he had promised you six months payment of allotments, then [know] that we have raised the matter in messages to the Commander of the [1804]

Faithful seeking the very terms that you have requested. As for what you have stated regarding not obstructing the Commander of the Faithful, leaving him with full authority to govern, we ourselves are obedient and loyal to the Commander of the Faithful. Sovereign power is God's alone; He is our Master and we His slaves, and we are in no way recalcitrant toward Him in the governance of affairs. You state that we wish the Commander of the Faithful misfortune. May God surround whoever wishes that with a ring of misfortune and humiliate him in both this world and the hereafter. May God preserve and keep you and perfect his bounty upon you.

When Abū al-Qāsim had read these letters to the Turks, they said to him that, as it was evening, they would consider their situation during the night and return to him in the morning with their decision. At which point they split up and Abū al-Qāsim returned to the Commander of the Faithful.

The following day was Friday. Mūsā b. Bughā rode out in the early morning from the palace of the Commander of the Faithful accompanied by one thousand five hundred troops. He camped outside the al-Ḥayr Gate, which was adjacent to the fiefs of al-Jawsaq and al-Karkh. Al-Muhtadī's brother, Abū al-Qāsim left with al-Karkhī,[274] reaching the assembled Turks, who numbered around five hundred horsemen and three thousand foot soldiers.

Now when Abū al-Qāsim had gone the previous night to address the Turks, he had with him the Caliph's endorsements. Upon arriving, he extracted a message from al-Muhtadī, the copy of which resembled the letter containing the endorsements rolled inside it. So when Abū al-Qāsim read the message, his audience went into an uproar of conflicting views. The crowd increased with numbers of mawlā infantry from around the district of Sāmarrā joining them in al-Ḥayr.

Abū al-Qāsim kept waiting, expecting to go off with a response [1805] that he could write up and then convey to the Commander of the Faithful. Nothing had happened, however, by four o'clock. They then broke up. One group said they wished that God would strengthen the resolve of the Commander of the Faithful to provide the full amount of the allotments owed them, as they had suffered great hardship because of the delays. Another faction stated that they would not be content until the Commander of the Faithful appointed his brothers over them, one in al-Karkh, another in al-Dūr, and a third in Sāmarrā; they did not want any of the mawlās to govern them. A third party stated that they wanted Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf to reappear. They were the smallest party of the three.

274. This is Muḥammad b. Mubāshir al-Karkhī, mentioned p. 76, above.

As the debate dragged on, Abū al-Qāsim left for al-Muhtadī with all the news, first picking up Mūsā where he had camped and setting off with him. After completing his Friday prayer, al-Muhtadī transfered the army to Muḥammad b. Bughā, with orders to go with his brother Abū al-Qāsim to the mawlās; they rode out with about five hundred cavalry. Mūsā meanwhile returned to the camp he had set up that morning. Abū al-Qāsim and Muḥammad b. Bughā reached the mawlās and mingled with them in their midst. Abū al-Qāsim spoke to them, saying that the Commander of the Faithful had issued documents endorsing everything they had asked for. There now remained none of their requests that the Commander of the Faithful had not gone all out to fulfill. In addition, a safe-conduct was issued for Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf to come out of hiding. Abū al-Qāsim then announced the safe-conduct for Ṣāliḥ, which Mūsā and Bāyakbāk had sought from the Commander of the Faithful, who had responded to [1806] them with his firmest assurances.

Abū al-Qāsim then asked, "What are you agreed upon?" Discussion intensified and when Abū al-Qāsim departed, the agreed-upon demands were stated by them as follows: Mūsā should hold the same rank of Bughā the elder; Ṣāliḥ should hold the rank that Waṣīf (his father) had held in the days of Bughā (the Elder); and Bāyakbāk should be restored to his previous rank. Moreover, the army should remain in its present hands until Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf emerged from hiding. And finally, an allowance ['aṭā'] should be assigned to them, as well as their periodic allotments (arzāq][275] expedited according to the Caliph's agreement. To these points they all assented. The mawlās departed but had scarcely gone a hundred fifty cubits' distance before they were quarreling again, some saying they were satisfied, others claiming they were not. Al-Muhtadī's messengers departed to him, as the soldiers had split up and were about to depart [for Sāmarrā]. Mūsā at that point returned as well, and the troops dispersed to their usual places in al-Karkh, al-Dūr, and Sāmarrā.

275. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 224, mentions only the allowance (al-'aṭā').

The next morning was Saturday. The Waṣīf clan along with a group of their freedmen (mawlās and ghilmān) rode forth calling out, "Arms!" Foot soldiers belonging to Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf's troops stole pack animals of the public infantry and proceeded to camp in Sāmarrā at the edge of the river valley of Isḥāq b. Ibrāhīm beside the mosque of Lujayn, the mother of al-Mutawakkil's children. Abū al-Qāsim had set out at the same time heading for al-Muhtadī's palace. On his way to al-Muhtadī's palace he passed Ṣāliḥ's forces; they joined him, his accompanying retinue, and pages and asked Abū al-Qāsim if he would take a message from them to the Commander of the Faithful. He told them to state their message but their response was such a confused babble that all he understood was that they wanted Ṣāliḥ [to return]. And so this was what he passed on to the Commander of the Faithful as well as to Mūsā in the presence of a group of commanders.

[1807] It was reported from someone present at this assembly that Mūsā b. Bughā said, "They demand that I give up Ṣāliḥ as though he were with me and I were the one who had hidden him away! If they have him, they should bring him forth!"

News of the gathering of the Waṣīf clan was confirmed and also that [Mūsā and his troops] broke out from the palace of the Commander of the Faithful and rode fully armed into the quarter of al-Ḥayr, assembling finally in the area between al-Dakkā and the rear of the main mosque. News [of this] reached the Turks and those who had taken refuge with them, and they ran helter-skelter, horseman, foot soldier, young, and old, none waiting for the other, until they reached the narrow streets and alleyways and the safety of their homes. Mūsā and his troops marched forward in a body toward the Caliph's palace, every commander in Sāmarrā riding with him. Proceeding steadily through the quarter, they left where the two city walls adjoined it. Mufliḥ and Wājin[276] and those attached to them went along Baghdad street until they reached the sheep market; they then turned into Abū Aḥmad street, where they met up with Mūsā's army. Mūsā and the commanders accompanying him, including Yā-jūr, Sātikīn, Yārjūkh, and ʿĪsā al-Karkhī, headed along Abū Aḥmad street as far as the river and then made their way toward the Jawsaq palace. The estimated size of Mūsā's army that day, which was Saturday, was four thousand horsemen armed with bows at the ready, breastplates,[277] spears, and battle-axes[278]. Most of the commanders who in al-Karkh had demanded Ṣāliḥ were now with Mūsā's army, prepared to take on anyone else who demanded him.

276. The reading is uncertain.

Someone who had inquired into these events reported that most [1808] of those riding with Mūsā were sympathetic toward Ṣāliḥ. There was no commotion that day among the troops of al-Karkh or al-Dūr. The first thing the troops did upon arriving at the Jawsaq palace was to issue a proclamation to the following effect: Anyone on the following morning, which was Sunday, from among all of Ṣāliḥ's commanders, his family, servants, and supporters who had not presented himself at the palace of the Commander of the Faithful would have his name dropped from the payroll and his house destroyed; and he would be flogged and led in chains to the Maṭbaq [prison].[279] Whoever emerged after having been in hiding after three days would be liable to the same punishment. Whoever stole an animal from a civilian or molested such a one in the public way would likewise be liable to a painful punishment. Mūsā and his company spent Sunday night, the 8th of Ṣafar (January 15, 870) still pursuing this matter.

On Monday morning al-Muhtadī received intelligence that the rebel Musāwir had been committing murder in and setting fire to Balad.[280] In his council meeting, al-Muhtadī proclaimed a call to arms and ordered Mūsā, Mufliḥ, and Bāyakbāk to leave [for Balad]. Mūsā evacuated his camp, but on Wednesday, the 11th of Ṣafar (January 18, 870), the order to Mūsā, Muḥammad b. Bughā, and Mufliḥ was canceled. They said, "We should all stay until our business and Ṣāliḥ's is settled." On that they were all agreed, fearing that Ṣāliḥ would cause them mischief in their absence.

---

277. Al-jawāshin (sg. jawshan). See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. j-w-sh-n.

278. Al-ṭabarzīnāt, an Arabized word from the Persian ṭabarzad. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṭ-b-r-z-d/l-/n.

279. The Index does not list a place by this name in Sāmarrā, though the context clearly indicates that this city is intended. The duplication of Baghdad place names in Sāmarrā was perhaps not uncommon (e.g., al-Karkh).

280. A town on the road from Mosul to Naṣībīn, some seven leagues from the former. See Le Strange, Lands, 99.

One of the mawlās reportedly said, "I saw one of the Waṣīf clan who had got together soldiers who were playing polo[281] with Mūsā and Bāyakbāk in the hippodrome of Bughā the Younger, on Wednesday the 11th of Ṣafar [January 18, 870]."

The search for Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf was intensified and for this reason raids were made upon many of those who had formerly been connected with him or else were suspected of giving him refuge.
[1809] Among these were Ibrāhīm b. Sa'dān al-Naḥwī, Ibrāhīm al-Ṭālibī, Hārūn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Azhar al-Shī'ī, Abū al-Aḥwaṣ b. Aḥmad b. Sa'īd b. Salm b. Qutaybah, Abū Bakr, an in-law of Abū Ḥarmalah al-Ḥajjām, Shāriyah the singer, al-Sarakhsī, chief of the special security police, and many others.

Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm b. Muṣ'ab b. Zurayq reported that the owner of the Rab' al-Qubbah, which was opposite the palace of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf, had related to him, saying, "On Sunday while we were sitting around, a slave boy suddenly emerged from a small alleyway and I could see that he was very frightened. We did not know him and wanted to ask him what the matter was, but he vanished. Moments later a mawlā of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf arrived, a ruffian ['ayyār][282] called Rūzbah; he was with three or four others whom we also did not know, and they disappeared into the alleyway. Shortly after, they reemerged with Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf and we then asked what was going on. It seems that the slave boy had gone into a house in the alleyway wanting a drink of water, when he heard someone say in Persian, 'O commander, hide quickly, for a slave boy has come asking for a drink of water.' Now the lad had heard these words and, as he was acquainted with this ruffian [Rūzbah], he went and told him what had happened. The ruffian rounded up three other men and they captured Ṣāliḥ."

This same ruffian who had led the attack on Ṣāliḥ reportedly said, "This slave lad told me what he had heard, and when I arrived at the house with these three men, there was Ṣāliḥ with mirror and comb

---

281. The text reads ṣawālijah, which is the plural of ṣawlajah, Arabized from the Persian chawgan. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṣ-w-l-j, describes the ṣawlajah as a kind of golf stick, with which a ball is struck by men on horseback, an accurate enough description of the game of polo.

282. See EI,[2] s.v. "'Ayyār"; cf. the lengthy study by C. Cahen, "Mouvements populaires et autonomisme urbain dans l'Asie musulmane du Moyen Âge," especially 25–56, 233–65.

in his hands attending to his beard. When he saw me, he ran into the house, and I was afraid he might be going for his sword or some [1810] weapon, and I held back. Then I cautiously spied upon him and discovered that he was huddled in a corner, so I approached and brought him out, and he did no more than implore me. When he did, I told him there was no way I could let him go; but I would take him past the residences of his family, his companions, his commanders, and hirelings, and if two of them were to meet me I would turn him over to them. However, I met no one on the way who was not eager to help me to abuse him."

It was reported that the two of them had gone a distance of some two miles accompanied by fewer than five government soldiers.

It was further reported that, when Ṣāliḥ was captured, he was wearing a shirt, a half-silk lined garment,[283] and drawers; his head was bare, and he walked barefoot.

Ṣāliḥ was borne away upon a mustard-colored pack animal, the crowd running behind him, while five special security men tried to prevent their attacking him. Having arrived with Ṣāliḥ at the palace of Mūsā b. Bughā, Bāyakbāk, Mufliḥ, Yājūr, Sātikīn, and other commanders joined them there. Ṣāliḥ was then taken, riding a saddled mule, through the Ḥayr Gate, which was next to the qiblah[284] side of the main mosque as they made their way to the Jawsaq palace. Just as they reached the edge of the minaret,[285] one of Mufliḥ's soldiers struck Ṣāliḥ a blow to the shoulder from behind, which nearly killed him. His head was then severed and the corpse left behind. At length they came to al-Muhtadī's palace a little before sunset. Ṣāliḥ's head, wrapped in a garment of one of Mufliḥ's pages, was dripping with [1811] blood. Al-Muhtadī was at that moment at prayer, and he did not see them bring in the head, which was then taken away to be cleaned up. After al-Muhtadī had finished his prayers, he was informed that they had killed Ṣāliḥ and brought his head to him. His only reaction was to say "Cover it up," and he began to repeat "Praise the Lord!"[286] The 283. Mubaṭṭanah mulḥam. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. b-ṭ-n.

284. The qiblah is the direction the Muslim faces when performing the prayer, i.e., the direction of Mecca. See EI,[2] s.v. "Masdjid."

285. This could be the minaret (al-minārah) of the mosque, which Yāqūt says could be seen from the countryside for miles around. See Muʿjam, III, 17.

286. Tasbīḥ. The word also signifies the act of praying. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. s-b-ḥ, notes that it meant to perform the supererogatory morning prayer.

news reached Ṣāliḥ's residence, at which a wailing lament was raised and continued thoughout the night. On Monday the 22nd of Ṣafar (January 29, 870), the head of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf was carried around town upon a lance, while proclamation was made: "This is the recompense for slaying one's master." It was hung up at the Public Gate for an hour and then removed, a practice followed for three successive days. The head of Bughā the Younger was removed at the same time as Ṣāliḥ's head was publicly displayed on the Monday.[287] Then it was given to Ṣāliḥ's family, and they buried it.

One of the mawlās reportedly said that he saw Mufliḥ crying when he had looked at Bughā's head, saying, "May God slay me if I do not avenge his death." On Thursday the 25th of Ṣafar (February 1, 870), Mūsā sent Ṣāliḥ's head to his sister Umm al-Faḍl, al-Nūshurī's wife, who had previously been married to Salamah b. Khāqān. One of the Hāshimites reportedly said, "I congratulated Mūsā b. Bughā for killing Ṣāliḥ, and he said, 'He was an enemy of the Commander of the Faithful and deserved to die.'" He also congratulated Bāyakbāk, who retorted, "I had nothing to do with this. Ṣāliḥ was my brother!"

Al-Salūlī recited these lines to Mūsā after Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf had been killed:

You have avenged yourself on the Pharaoh when he acted tyrannically.
And you have come when you did, O Mūsā, as ordained.[288] [1812] Three; each of them is an oppressor, a brother of envy, accusing you of oppression and aggression out of hate.
Waṣīf is in Karkh, of whom an example was made, and Bughā is at the bridge, burning in the embers and flames.
And Ṣāliḥ, son of Waṣīf, his body lies tossed in the dust in al-Ḥayr, and his soul is in hell.

On the 1st of Jumādā I of this year (Thursday, April 6, 870), Mūsā b. Bughā and Bāyakbāk set out against the Khārijite Musāwir. Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq bade them farewell.

Also in this same month of Jumādā I (April 6–May 5, 870), Musāwir b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd and the Khārijite ʿUbaydah al-ʿUmrūsī met 287. Bughā's death had been reported by Ṭabarī earlier, in the year 254/868, and his head was publicly displayed first in Sāmarrā and then in Baghdad. See III, 1694–95.

288. Reference to Qur'ān 20: 40.

in battle at al-Kuḥayl. They each held opposing views.[289] In his victory Musāwir killed ʿUbaydah.

In this month of Jumādā I Musāwir and Mufliḥ met each other in battle. I was told that Musāwir returned from al-Kuḥayl after he had killed al-ʿUmrūsī, with many of his men wounded, whose injuries had not yet healed. Indeed the battle [against al-ʿUmrūsī] had left them exhausted by the time they reached Mūsā's army and those who had joined him. As Musāwir attacked, Mūsā was in a defensive position. Their encounter took place at Jabal Zaynī,[290] and, when the victory Musāwir sought did not occur, he and his troops held fast to the mountain side and made their way to the top. There they lit fires [1813] and stuck their spears into the ground. Mūsā was camped farther down on the lower slopes of the mountain. Later Musāwir escaped by leading his troops down the far side of the mountain away from Mūsā's position and left them thinking that he was still on top.

On the 14th of Rajab of this year (June 17, 870), al-Muhtadī was deposed, and he died on the 18th (June 21, 870).

An Account of [al-Muhtadī's] Removal and Death

It was reported that on the 2nd of Rajab (June 5, 870) the dwellers of al-Karkh, Sāmarrā, and al-Dūr were aroused to demand their allotments. Al-Muhtadī sent their chief Ṭabāyaghū[291] and his own brother ʿAbdallāh to talk to them, but they were not well received; instead they insisted on talking directly to the Commander of the Faithful himself.

Abū Naṣr (Muḥammad) b. Bughā left that night for his brother's army camp, which was at al-Sinn in the vicinity of the Khārijite (Musāwir). Meanwhile, a group of soldiers went to the Jawsaq palace on Wednesday and al-Muhtadī spoke to them for some time. Their allowance was not forthcoming on Wednesday and Thursday, but they were prepared to refrain from any action until they knew what Mūsā b. Bughā was prepared to do. Now Mūsā had paid the allowance to his army for a month since his troops had been patient while he was engaged in fighting (Musāwir) the Khārijite. But then disagreements broke out and Mūsā set off for the Khurāsān Road.

289. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 226, explains that the feud was over whether or not a sinner's repentance can be accepted; Musāwir argued that it should be, while ʿUbaydah claimed it could not.

290. Ibn Ḥawqal, Kitāb al-masālik wa-al-mamālik, 110.

291. The reading is conjectural.

Explanations differed as to why these disagreements occurred, [1814] why Mūsā left for the Khurāsān Road, and why al-Muhtadī had openly confronted certain Turks (al-atrāk) engaged in battle against him.

Some said that Mūsā had withdrawn from the conflict with the Khārijite (Musāwir) and had headed for the Khurāsān Road because al-Muhtadī was well disposed toward Bāyakbāk, who was still with Mūsā's army confronting Musāwir. The Caliph wrote to Bāyakbāk, ordering him to take command over Mūsā's army and either to dispose of Mūsā b. Bughā and Mufliḥ or else to bring them back in chains. When this despatch reached Bāyakbāk he took it to Mūsā b. Bughā and said, "I am not at all happy with this, as it appears to be only a plot against the lot of us. If you are treated this way today, then tomorrow I could be treated in the same manner. What do you think?" Mūsā replied, "In my view you should return to Sāmarrā and tell the Caliph that you will loyally assist him against Mufliḥ and myself. In this way he will feel at ease about you, and then we can plan to kill him." After returning from battle against the rebel they made for their homes, while Bāyakbāk went to see al-Muhtadī. Confronting him angrily, al-Muhtadī said, "I ordered you to kill Mūsā and Mufliḥ, so how could you leave the army and treat this matter so lightly?" Bāyakbāk asked how he could have dealt with them and managed to kill them when they had superior forces and were more powerful than he. Moreover, he said, "Once something or other happened between Mufliḥ and myself, and I did not avenge myself then; but I have in any case brought my army, companions, and those obedient to me to assist and reinforce your rule, and this has left Mūsā with fewer supporters." Al-Muhtadī said to him, "Lay down your weapons," and he ordered him brought into the palace.
[1815] Bāyakbāk replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, this is no way to treat me, as I have come to you in good faith; I must first return home and leave instructions for my companions and family." Al-Muhtadī refused to allow that, as it was essential to check Bāyakbāk's story. And so Bāyakbāk was relieved of his weapons.

When Bāyakbāk's companions had not heard from him for a while, his chamberlain Aḥmad b. Khāqān quickly urged them to search for their leader before something happened to him. Seething with anger, the Turks surrounded the Jawsaq palace. At the time al-Muhtadī was with Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. Yaʿqūb b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr.[292] When he perceived these developments, al-Muhtadī asked him for advice on what he should do. Ṣāliḥ replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, none of your ancestors could match you for courage and daring. Abū Muslim's[293] hold over the Khurāsānīs was far more powerful than this Turk's position[294] among his followers. But no sooner had [Abū Muslim's] head been thrown to them than they quieted down, even though some of them worshiped him and regarded him as their lord. So if you were to do that, they would [similarly] be appeased; for you are much bolder and stouthearted than al-Manṣūr."

So al-Muhtadī summoned Muḥammad b. Mubāshir al-Karkhī, a blacksmith who had made tent pegs and poles in al-Karkh and then had become very devoted to al-Muhtadī in Baghdad, and the Caliph trusted him. Now he ordered him to kill Bāyakbāk, which deed was done while the Turks were lined up armed in the Jawsaq palace demanding to see Bāyakbāk. Al-Muhtadī gave the order to the commander ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb to throw them Bāyakbāk's head. He did so and, after a brief delay, the Turks broke into a rage, and one of them attacked and killed ʿAttāb. Al-Muhtadī then sent for contingents of the Farāghinah, the Maghāribah, the Ūkashiyyah,[295] the Ushrūsaniyyah,[296] and Turks who had rendered allegiance to him for the sum of two dirhems and some barley meal (sawīq). After they arrived, many among their ranks were killed, about which people have had [1816] many [different] things to say. It was said that some four thousand Turks who took part in the fighting were killed; others put the number at two thousand, while others said only a thousand. That was Saturday, the 13th of Rajab (June 16, 870).

On Sunday the numbers of Turks gathered together had swollen to some ten thousand men united by their common cause. The brother 292. A descendant of the second ʿAbbāsid Caliph, al-Manṣūr.

293. One of the leading commanders of the ʿAbbāsid revolt against the Umayyads in Khurāsān; his rising power was perceived as a threat to the new dynasty, and he was murdered by the Caliph al-Manṣūr. On his role and significance, see Shaban, The ʿAbbāsid Revolution, 153–68; EI,² s.v. "Abū Muslim."

294. That is, Bāyakbāk.

295. The reading is uncertain, a variant being al-Ubkasiyyah.

296. Troops drawn from the province of Ushrusānah, which lay to the east of Samarqand between the rivers of Sughd and the Jaxartes. See Le Strange, Lands, 474–76.

of Bāyakbāk, Ṭaghūtyā,[297] and Aḥmad b. Khāqān, Bāyakbāk's chamberlain, had arrived with around five hundred men, plus the Turks and Persians brought by Ṭaghūtyā. Al-Muhtadī went out with Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī, who was wearing a Qur'ān tied around his neck; he pleaded with people to come to the aid of their Caliph. But the final straw was when the Turks accompanying al-Muhtadī sided with their fellows who supported Bāyakbāk's brother. Al-Muhtadī was left with the Farāghinah and the Maghrībah and some of the populace, who were of little use to him. Thirsting for vengence, Ṭaghūtyā, Kāyakbāk's brother, launched a bitter attack, broke up their battle order, and routed them. Large numbers were killed while the rest turned and fled. Al-Muhtadī, sword in hand, fled from the scene, crying out, "O you people, come to your Caliph's assistance!" He finally managed to reach the place of Abū Ṣāliḥ ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād, which was located next to Khashabat Bābak. Aḥmad b. Jumayl, the commandant of police, was there. Al-Muhtadī entered [1817] and, setting aside his weapon, he donned a [plain] white garment, in order to slip from the roof of one palace to another and make his escape. A search for him failed.

Then Aḥmad b. Khāqān arrived with thirty horsemen, making inquiries of al-Muhtadī's whereabouts and learned news of him at the palace of Ibn Jumayl. Aḥmad promptly rushed his men to the rooftops and al-Muhtadī was struck at last by an arrow and wounded by a sword. Aḥmad b. Khāqān had him carried on a pack horse, or mule, with a groom riding behind until they returned to the [Jawsaq] palace. His enemies gathered and began cuffing him and spitting in his face. They sought information as to the value of goods and furnishings he had sold, and al-Muhtadī confessed to a sum of six hundred thousand [dinars], which al-Karkhī had deposited for him with various people in Baghdad. They took his written pledge for that amount and then handed him over to someone who [tortured him] by kicking him in the testicles until he died.[298]

---

297. The reading is conjectural.

298. Fa wuṭiyaʾ ʿalā khuṣyatihi ḥattā qatalahu. Ibn al-Athīr adds that he was also struck by sword blows and that afterward his executioners bore witness that he had died without a mark on him. He was buried in the tomb of the Caliph al-Muntaṣir. Kāmil, VII, 230. See also Ṭabarī's account, p. 99, below.

Other Accounts of al-Muhtadī's Death

Someone else said that the beginning of the whole dispute occurred when the sons of the Turks met together and stated that they were not content to allow anyone to be their chief except the Commander of the Faithful. They wrote to Mūsā b. Bughā and Bāyakbāk to that effect, while the two were still engaged with the Khārijite [Musāwir]. On Friday Mūsā arrived with his men at a bridge in the district of al-Wazīriyyah. Al-Muhtadī was camped with his army in al-Ḥayr; he approached them but then turned away and proceeded armed to the Jawsaq palace. On Saturday, the 13th of Rajab [June 16, 870], Bāyakbāk came [to al-Muhtadī] as an obedient subject, while Mūsā headed for the district of the Khurāsān Road with about two thousand men. One of the mawlās came to tell al-Muhtadī that Bāyakbāk had promised Mūsā he would assassinate him in the Jawsaq palace. Al-Muhtadī had Bāyakbāk disarmed and imprisoned. This [1818] was on Saturday, about the time of the afternoon prayer. Later the inhabitants of al-Karkh and al-Dūr went out in search of Bāyakbāk. The search was resumed the following morning, and everyone joined in either walking or riding, each one carrying a weapon. Al-Muhtadī had just finished the noon prayer when the crowd reached the Jawsaq palace. He confronted them with the Farāghinah and Maghāribah, but the Turks forced them back and then mounted a full attack upon them. Pursuing al-Muhtadī's forces, the Turks had laid a trap for them and many of the Farāghinah and Maghāribah were slain. Al-Muhtadī himself fled and as he passed the residence of Abū al-Wazīr, one of his servants shouted out, "O you people, here is your Caliph!"

With the Turks in hot pursuit behind him, al-Muhtadī managed to reach the palace of Aḥmad b. Jumayl and, by scaling the walls, he moved from one residence to another. The Turks spread throughout the entire district and finally trapped him in the house of a servant belonging to ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar al-Bāzyār. Wearing only a shirt and drawers and wounded in the side, he was taken away on an emaciated pack animal. The residences of [Muḥammad b. Mubāshir] al-Karkhī, the Banū Thawābah, and a number of others were sacked. On Monday Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil, who was known as Ibn Fityān, was brought to the palace of Yārjūkh, while the Turks circulated the streets praising the populace for not having opposed them.

Others said that the cause of these events was quite different. On Monday, the 2nd of Rajab (June 5, 870), the troops of Dūr Sāmarrā and al-Karkh became agitated and began to congregate in al-Karkh [1819] and the area beyond it. Al-Muhtadī despatched to them Kayghalagh, Ṭabāyaghū b. Ṣūl Artakīn and his own brother ʿAbdallāh, who remained with them until the crowd calmed down, whereupon the men returned to the [Jawsaq] palace. Word reached Abū Naṣr Muḥammad b. Bughā the Elder that al-Muhtadī had been speaking to the mawlās about him and Mūsā, telling them that the [Bughā] brothers possessed money. This stirred fear in Abū Naṣr, and he fled on Tuesday night, the 3rd of Rajab (June 6, 870). Al-Muhtadī sent four letters to Abū Naṣr granting him safe conduct for himself and those with him. Two letters arrived while he was in al-Muḥammadiyyah[299] with Artakīn b. B.r.n.m. kātakīn[300] and the others while he was with Faraj the Younger. Abū Naṣr put his trust in the safe-conduct and returned to the [Jawsaq] palace, together with his other brother, Ḥabshūn, and Bakālabā. They were imprisoned along with Kayghalagh, Abū Naṣr being isolated from the others. Money was demanded of him and fifteen thousand dinars was received from his agent. On Tuesday, the 3rd of Rajab (June 6, 870), Abū Naṣr was put to death and his body tossed into a well of the underground canal system (al-qanāt). The corpse was removed on Monday, the 16th of Rajab (June 19, 870), and taken to his house. It reeked of decay. Three hundred mithqāls[301] of must and six hundred of camphor were purchased to apply to the body, but the odor could not be checked. Al-Ḥasan b. al-Maʾmūn said the funeral prayer over him.

Al-Muhtadī had corresponded with Mūsā b. Bughā at the time of Abū Naṣr's imprisonment and ordered Mūsā to surrender the army to Bāyakbāk and to bring his mawlās to Sāmarrā. He also wrote Bāyakbāk about delivering the army into his command and ordering [1820] him to continue the fight against the Khārijite [Musāwir]. Bāyakbāk took the letter to Mūsā; he read it, and they then agreed to return to Sāmarrā. Word reached al-Muhtadī that they had disobeyed him. He called the mawlās together, exhorting them to obedience, urging them to attend him in the palace and leave off neglecting him. For each of the Turks and those of similar status al-Muhtadī arranged a stipend of two dirhems per day to be paid, and a dirhem for each of the Maghāribah. From these two groups and their friends he rounded up some fifteen thousand men in the Jawsaq palace and other apartments. Among the Turks was a man called al-Kāmilī. In charge of administration of the palace after Kayghalagh had been imprisoned was Masrūr al-Balkhī; the chief commander was Ṭabāyaghū, and ʿAbdallāh b. Takīn was put in charge of prisoners.

299. The place of that name in the marshlands (baṭāʾiḥ) seems intended here.

300. The first part of the name is unpointed in the text, and therefore the first three consonants are conjectural.

301. For details of the variations in the use of this term of measurement, see Hinz, Islamische Masse, 1–2.

Mūsā, Mufliḥ, and Bāyakbāk learned of the incarceration of Abū Naṣr, Ḥabshūn, and the others and were hence on their guard. On Thursday messengers and despatches flowed between them and al-Muhtadī. The same day, which was the 11th of Rajab (June 14, 870), al-Muhtadī ventured forth with his force to await the arrival of the enemy. No one, however, appeared. On the Friday, the 12th of Rajab (June 15, 870), news was confirmed that al-Muhtadī and Mufliḥ had turned off the Sāmarrā road toward the district of al-Jabal and halted there. On Saturday Bāyakbāk, Yārjūkh, Asātakīn, ʿAlī b. Bāris, Sīmā the Tall, and Khuṭārish presented themselves at the Jawsaq palace. Bāyakbāk and his deputy Aḥmad b. Khāqān were imprisoned, while the rest were dismissed. Bāyakbāk's followers and some of the other Turks met together and asked themselves why their commander had been imprisoned and why Abū Naṣr had been killed. Al-Muhtadī confronted them on Saturday, but, as no conflict [1821] occurred, he returned [once again] to the palace. On Sunday the two sides met again, al-Muhtadī with his force of Maghāribah, Turks of the lower-ranking guards,[302] and the Farāghinah. He placed Masrūr al-Balkhī on the right flank and Yārjūkh on the left, with himself, Asātakīn, Ṭabāyaghū, and some other commanders occupying the heart of the battle line.

As the day grew hotter, the combatants approached each other, and battle ensued. The men demanded Bāyakbāk, and al-Muhtadī threw his severed head into their midst. ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb had pulled it out of his tunic. When they saw it, Bāyakbāk's brother Ṭaghūtyā and a group of his elite soldiers intensified the attack against al-Muhtadī's forces. The right flank turned, followed by the left, while the remainder of the army fled from al-Muhtadī. There were many slain on the two sides.

302. Al-atrāk al-barrāniyīn. See n. 271, above.

Ḥabshūn b. Bughā reportedly said that seven hundred eighty men had been killed. The fighters dispersed and al-Muhtadī returned to the palace, locking behind him the gates through which he had entered and making his exit from the al-Maṣāff Gate, evenutally through the Iṭākh Gate into the little market of Masrūr and along al-Wāthiq street until he finally reached the Public Gate. There he cried out, "O you people, I am the Commander of the Faithful. Fight to defend your Caliph!" But none of the people heeded him. As he passed thus, crying out in the street but seeing no one prepared to help him, he reached the prison gate and ordered the release of all the inmates, thinking that they would come to his aid. Instead, they all fled. Not one responded to him.

After this al-Muhtadī made his way to the palace of Abū Ṣāliḥ
[1822] ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Yazdād, where the commandant of police, Aḥmad b. Jumayl, was staying. They broke in on him, and he was taken out by way of the Bureau of Estates and taken to al-Jawsaq, where he was imprisoned along with Aḥmad b. Khāqān. Ibn Jumayl's palace was then plundered.[303]

Among the commanders of the Maghāribah who were killed during the battle was Naṣr b. Aḥmad al-Zubayrī, and of the commanders of the Shākiriyyah ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb was killed bringing back Bāyakbāk's head. According to some al-Muhtadī killed a considerable number with his own hands in the course of the fighting.

Later, after al-Muhtadī was imprisoned, strong words were exchanged between him and his captors. They wanted him to abdicate but he refused, surrendering himself instead to death. They said that he had, in his own hand, made a written agreement with Mūsā b. Bughā, Bāyakbāk, and a number of the other commanders that he would neither deceive, harass, nor murder any of them, or even think of doing so, and, [if] he actually treated them in this manner, either collectively or individually, and they found out, they would be free to break their oath of allegiance to him, take charge of affairs, and depose whomsoever they pleased. On this basis they felt free to break their compact.

303. Which presumably explains why he was staying elsewhere at the time of al-Muhtadi's final hours.

After the rout of the Caliph's forces, Yārjūkh had gone to the [Jawsaq] palace and taken some of al-Mutawakkil's sons back to his own palace. There, on Tuesday[304] the 13th of Rajab (June 16, 870), the oath of allegiance was rendered to Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil, known as Ibn Fityān, who took the regnal name of al-Mu'tamid 'alā Allāh. On Thursday,[305] the 18th of Rajab (June 21, 870), the death of Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq al-Muhtadī was witnessed. The only marks [1823] on his body were the two wounds he had received on the Sunday during the fighting; one of these was an arrow wound, the other was sustained by a sword blow. Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid and a number of the Caliph's brothers recited prayers at his funeral. He was buried in the tomb of al-Muntaṣir. Mūsā b. Bughā and Mufliḥ entered Sāmarrā on Saturday, the 20th of Rajab (June 23, 870); Mūsā saluted al-Mu'tamid, who granted him a robe of honor. Mūsā returned to his residence, and calm settled upon the populace.

Someone who reportedly had witnessed these events said that on Saturday evening, the 1st of Rajab (June 4, 870), the whole population of al-Karkh and al-Dūr was stirred up and began to congregate. Whenever the people became agitated, al-Muhtadī would send his brother 'Abdallāh to them, just as he did on this occasion. When 'Abdallāh got there, he found them making their way to the Jawsaq palace. He addressed them and guaranteed them action to meet their needs. They, however, refused [this promise], insisting instead on returning with him to the Commander of the Faithful to plead their case with him directly. Now when 'Abdallāh returned, there were present in the palace at that time Abū Naṣr Muḥammad b. Bughā, Ḥabshūn, Kayghalagh, Masrūr al-Balkhī, and others. 'Abdallāh conveyed to al-Muhtadī what had transpired between him and the crowd, and he was ordered to go back and bring some of them to the palace. Encountering the crowd now quite near the Jawsaq palace, he directed them to stay where they were and send some of their number to accompany him. This they also rejected.

When the news of the crowd's approach reached Abū Naṣr and the others in the palace, they all left by way of the al-Nazālah Gate. No [1824] one was left in the palace except Masrūr al-Balkhī and Alṭūn, the deputy of Kayghalagh, and among the secretaries only 'Īsā b. Far-304. Actually, a Friday.

305. Wednesday, in fact.

rukhānshāh. The mawlās entered the palace near the gate of the Qaṣr al-Aḥmar, filling it with about four thousand men. They reached al-Muhtadī and complained to him of their situation. Chiefly, they were counting on the removal of their amīrs from responsibility for them, so that their affairs could be handled by the Commander of the Faithful's own brothers. Moreover, they wanted the amīrs and secretaries admonished for extorting sums from the central treasuries, the amount mentioned running to one hunded fifty million.[306] Al-Muhtadī promised to examine the matter and respond to their requests. So they remained in the palace for the rest of the day and al-Muhtadī sent Muḥammad b. Mubāshir al-Karkhī to purchase quantities of barley meal for them to eat.

At that, Abū Naṣr b. Bughā moved promptly to set up camp in al-Ḥayr a short distance from the racecourse. Around five hundred men joined him there, but during the night most slipped away, leaving behind fewer than a hundred. So Abū Naṣr decamped and moved to al-Muḥammadiyyah.[307]

On Thursday morning the mawlās resumed their original demands. They were told that what they wanted was difficult to achieve. Dislodging power from the hands of the amīrs would not be smooth sailing for them; all the more difficult when combined with attempts to seize their money. "Consider your own positions. If you think that you have the patience to see this affair through to its end, [1825] then the Commander of the Faithful has responded positively. But if it be otherwise, the Commander of the Faithful will do his best for you." They refused, however, to accept anything other than what they had sought in the first place. So they were invited to take oaths of allegiance and obedience that they would stand by their word and not go back on it, that they would fight against anyone who attacked them, and that they would be loyal to the Commander of the Faithful and protect him. To all these conditions they consented. Solemn oaths were administered and about one thousand men swore to them that day.

ʿĪsā b. Farrukhānshāh,[308] who was in charge of affairs, assuming

306. It is not specified whether the sum mentioned is in dirhams or dinars.

307. This location is clearly the one in close proximity to Sāmarrā. In the Index it is mistakenly placed in the marshlands of the south.

308. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 303–4; ʿĪsā did not actually hold the title of vizier.

the responsibilities of vizier, wrote to Abū Naṣr on behalf of the mawlās, mentioning their objection to his leaving the palace without cause and also that they had come to the Commander of the Faithful only to plead their needs and that when they found the palace empty they remained. Were he to return, they would restore his position, having had no wish to provoke him.

ʿĪsā also wrote in the same vein to Abū Naṣr on behalf of the Caliph. Between late afternoon and early evening Abū Naṣr approached from al-Muḥammadiyyah and entered the [Jawsaq] palace with his brother Ḥabshūn, Kayghalagh, Bakālabā, and a group of other commanders. The mawlās stood before them, armed. Abū Naṣr and the others joined al-Muhtadī where he was seated. Saluting him, Abū Naṣr drew near and kissed his hand, his feet, and the carpet. He then backed up, and al-Muhtadī addressed him, saying, "O Muḥammad, what do you think about what the mawlās are saying?" "What are they saying?" asked Abū Naṣr. Al-Muhtadī said, "They report that you all have expropriated wealth and usurped posts and that you give no thought to their affairs or to what could restore their welfare." Abū Naṣr Muḥammad replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, what have I to do with finances? I was not secretary of a bureau nor did administrative districts fall into my hands." Al-Muhtadī asked him, "So where is all the wealth if it is not in your possession [1826] and your brother's or in the possession of your secretaries and your companions?"

The mawlās now came closer. ʿAbdallāh b. Takīn and a group of them stepped forward and, seizing Abū Naṣr by the hand, cried out, "Here is the enemy of the Commander of the Faithful, standing before him armed with a sword." They relieved him of his sword. One of Abū Naṣr's pages named Thītal, who was then present, drew his sword and made a move to prevent them from harming Abū Naṣr. As Thītal had moved next to the Caliph, ʿAbdallāh b. Takīn reacted instinctively and struck him a blow on the head with his sword. No one in the room was without his sword drawn. Al-Muhtadī rose and entered a nearby apartment. Muḥammad b. Bughā was taken away and placed in a compartment in the palace, while the rest of his companions were imprisoned. The mawlās wanted to kill Abū Naṣr's page, but al-Muhtadī restrained them, saying he would handle the matter in his own way. He ordered the page given a [clean] shirt from the wardrobe and his head cleansed of blood; then he should be put in prison.

By Thursday morning the numbers of mawlās had increased and oaths of loyalty and obedience sworn. Later on ʿAbdallāh b. al-Wāthiq gave the order for a thousand men of the Shākiriyyah, Farāghinah, and others to depart for al-Rafīf. Among the Khurāsānian commanders instructed to go with them were the following: Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Wāthiqī, ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb, Hārūn b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Azhar, Ibrāhīm the brother of Abū ʿAwn, Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad b. Dāʾūd, a son of Naṣr b. Shabath, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Dīnār, Aḥmad b. Farīdūn, as well as others.

Afterward ʿAbdallāh b. al-Wāthiq learned that these commanders [1827] were saying to each other how improper it was to send them to the district [of al-Rafīf], so he abandoned the venture. They had a mind to correspond with Mūsā and Mufliḥ about leaving [for Sāmarrā] and handing the army over to one of the other commanders. Finally, they agreed to write Mūsā and Mufliḥ about the matter, and word was also sent to some of the commanders concerning their assumption of the army management in place of the two. Notes were sent as well to lower-ranking officers about what their troops in Sāmarrā had asked and what [positive] responses they received. Copies were made [for them] of the letters that had been sent to the commanders, and they were told to wait and see. If Mūsā and Mufliḥ swiftly did as they had been ordered, coming with their freedmen to the Caliph's palace and handing over the army to whomever had been charged with the task, well and good. Otherwise they were to shackle the two of them, taking them by force to the Caliph. These letters were despatched by means of thirty men, who left Sāmarrā on the night of Friday, the 5th of Rajab (June 8, 870).

Meanwhile in the palace each one who swore an oath of obedience was paid the sum of two dirhems per day. ʿAbdallāh b. Takīn was the person in charge of distributing the money to the oath takers; he was Kanjūr's brother-in-law. When Mūsā and his companions learned of this, Mūsā, who was then in al-Sinn, became alarmed about Kanjūr and had him beaten and imprisoned. Bāyakbāk heard the news while he was in al-Ḥadīthah and he went to al-Sinn[309] and had Kanjūr removed from prison. The messengers arrived in al-Sinn with the commander's despatches while the army was assembled there. One of the despatches was read out to the troops. They responded by swearing an oath of support and departing for the bridge at al-Rafīf, where they established camp. This was Thursday, the 11th of Rajab [1828] (June 14, 870).

309. Two locations on the Tigris south of Mosul, al-Ḥadīthah lying at the junction with the Upper Zāb river, al-Sinn near the junction with the Lower Zāb river. For both, see Le Strange, Lands, 90, 91.

The same day al-Muhtadī set out for al-Ḥayr. He reviewed the troops, marched around a bit, and then returned [to the Jawsaq palace], giving the order to have tents and pavilions[310] pitched for them in al-Ḥayr. On Friday morning around a thousand men from Mūsā's army had left [deserting him]. Among them were Kūtakīn and Khushanaj.[311] Once again al-Muhtadī made for al-Ḥayr. He placed Kūtakīn in charge of the right flank of his forces and Khushanaj in charge of the left, while he himself took the middle sector. Next the messengers began again to shuttle between the two armies. What Mūsā b. Bughā wanted was to be made governor of some district and allowed to proceed to it, while what the men wanted Mūsā to do was to come with his freedmen in order to negotiate with them. Nothing, however, was settled that day.

On Friday evening those who wanted to leave Mūsā had done so and Mūsā together with Mufliḥ had turned again toward the Khurāsān Road with about one thousand men. The same night Bāyakbāk and a group of his commanders joined ʿĪsā al-Karkhī and spent the night with him. The following morning, Saturday, Bāyakbāk and his company came to the Jawsaq palace, where he, Yārjūkh, Asātakīn, Aḥmad b. Khāqān, Khaṭārimush, and others were relieved of their swords. They appeared together before al-Muhtadī and saluted him. All were ordered to withdraw save Bāyakbāk who was commanded to remain standing before al-Muhtadī while he enumerated his many transgressions against Muslims and Islam. After this the mawlās abused him and locked him up in one of the palace chambers. Just five hours later, at sunset on Saturday, he was killed. Thus [1829] was the matter settled. There was no unrest and only a few who disapproved of Bāyakbāk's treatment bothered to talk about it, and even they did not seem especially concerned.

On Sunday the Turks expressed their objection to the Farāghinah

310. Al-khiyām wa-al-maḍārib.
311. The Arabized form of the Persian Khushank.

being treated as their equals in the palace, their admission to it altogether, [for] it became clear to them that the plot to murder the Turks' own leaders was designed to give the Farāghinah and the Maghāribah the upper hand. The Turks then abandoned the palace entirely to them. Protestations at that were voiced from al-Karkh and also included a demand for Bāyakbāk, as his troops had joined with theirs. Al-Muhtadī instructed a group of the Farāghinah to attend upon him, and he informed them of the Turks' objections. He said to them, "If you are sure you are up to taking care of the Turks, the Commander of the Faithful would not be displeased to have you by his side. If you feel yourselves unable to cope with them, we will be willing to do what they wish before things come to a head." The Farāghinah said they could cope and that, if they were combined with the Maghāribah, they could overcome them (the Turks); and they listed a number of reasons for their priority over the Turks. The Farāghinah sought to induce al-Muhtadī to go after the Turks and discussion about this continued until noon. Finally, when al-Muhtadī marched forth, most of his cavalry was comprised of Farāghinah and most of his infantry of Maghāribah. The Turks, who numbered around ten thousand men, were located between al-Karkh and the district of the fiefs. Al-Muhtadī and his forces numbered only six thousand, fewer than a thousand of whom were Turks, these being the troops of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf and a contingent accompanying Yārjūkh.

As the two sides advanced toward each other, Yārjūkh and his con-
[1830] tingent broke off, while the troops of Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf fled in retreat to their homes. Ṭāshtimur emerged from behind al-Dakkah, where his troops had been waiting in ambush, and against stiff resistance hand-to-hand fighting raged for a time during the day until al-Muhtadī's forces were beaten. Al-Muhtadī held on trying to rally his troops around him; he continued fighting until he despaired of their return and then rode off in a hasty retreat. He carried an embossed sword[312] and was wearing a breastplate covered by a garment of patterned white-silk material.[313] He reached Khashabat Bābak, all the while urging people to help him and stand against the enemy. However, only a party of riffraff (al-ʿayyārūn)[314] decided to follow him.

312. Sayf mushaṭṭab. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. sh-ṭ-b.
313. Ḥarīr abyaḍ muʿayyan. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ʿ-y-n.
314. See references in note 282, above.

When they got as far as the prison, they seized his horse's bridle and demanded he release the prison inmates. He turned his face from them, but they did not leave him until he had given the command to open the prison; then they abandoned him and busied themselves at the prison gate. Al-Muhtadī was left entirely alone.

He found his way to the palace of Abū Ṣāliḥ b. Yazdād where Aḥmad b. Jumayl was staying. Upon entering he had the doors locked behind him and shed his clothes and weapons. He had received a hip wound, and requested a [clean] shirt and pantaloons, which Aḥmad b. Jumayl gave him. After cleaning the wound, he drank some water and then said his prayers. A party of around thirty Turks led by Yārjūkh approached the palace of Abū Ṣāliḥ and beat upon the door until they were admitted. Al-Muhtadī heard them and, grabbing his sword, he made his way as quickly as possible up a flight of steps to the palace roof. One of the Turks wanted to go up after al-Muhtadī and, lunging at him with his sword, he missed and tumbled down [1831] the stairs. The Turks fired arrows at him, one of which struck his chest. It was only a slight wound but al-Muhtadī nevertheless knew he was finished. So he surrendered and descended, throwing away his sword. Seizing al-Muhtadī the Turks put him on a pack animal, with one of them in charge, and made their way back along the road he had come from to Yārjūkh's palace in the district of the fiefs.

The Jawsaq palace was plundered by the Turks who stripped it clean. Aḥmad, known as Ibn Fityān, b. al-Mutawakkil, imprisoned at the time in al-Jawsaq, was released by the Turks. They wrote to Mūsā b. Bughā asking him to come to [Sāmarrā]. Al-Muhtadī remained in their care, but no one did anything more to him. On Tuesday, in the district of the fiefs, they rendered the oath of allegiance to Aḥmad, the son of al-Mutawakkil, taking him on Wednesday to the Jawsaq palace, where the Hāshimites and the court elite also rendered their allegiance.

During these days, attempts to persuade al-Muhtadī to abdicate were made, but he refused and would not consent. He died on Wednesday. The following day, Thursday, his body was produced for the Hāshimites and the court elite; then his face was uncovered and his body washed. Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Wāḥid recited the funeral prayers over him on Thursday, the 18th of Rajab 256 (June 21, 870).

On Saturday, the 20th of Rajab (June 23, 870), Mūsā b. Bughā arrived [in Sāmarrā], and Aḥmad Ibn Fityān rode to the Public Audience Hall[315] on Monday, the 22nd of Rajab (June 25, 870); the public oath of allegiance was rendered there.

Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā al-Qurashī reportedly said that, when al-Muhtadī fell into the hands of the Turks, he refused to abdicate. So they removed his fingers and toes, causing the palms of his hands and his feet to become swollen. After that they did several other things to him, until he died.[316]

Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā also[317] reported, on the cause of the death of [1832] Abū Naṣr Muḥammad b. Bughā, that he had set out from Sāmarrā to meet his brother Mūsā. Al-Muhtadī sent his brother ʿAbdallāh after Abū Naṣr with a contingent of the Maghāribah and Farāghinah, who caught up with him in al-Rafīf and brought him back to be imprisoned.

Once, before the conflict with al-Muhtadī, Abū Naṣr had visited the Caliph, greeting him. Al-Muhtadī said to him, "O Muḥammad, your brother Mūsā came [to Sāmarrā] with his army and slaves (ʿabīd) only to slay Ṣāliḥ b. Waṣīf and leave again." Abū Naṣr replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, may God protect you from thinking that! Mūsā is your loyal servant, engaged in fighting a vile enemy." Al-Muhtadī said, "Ṣāliḥ was more useful to us than Mūsā, and his policies better suited the empire. Now this ʿAlawī[318] has returned to al-Rayy." Abū Naṣr replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, what can he [Mūsā] do? He had defeated him and slain his companions and scattered his forces in every direction. But, whenever he goes away, he [al-Ḥasan] always returns. My God, he [al-Ḥasan] will do so again unless you order him [Mūsā] to remain in al-Rayy forever." The Caliph said, "Enough of that! Your brother has accomplished nothing more than stealing and expropriating property for himself."

---

315. Dār al-ʿāmmah. Bosworth, "Recruitment," 63, notes that this term indicated the outer sections and annexes of the Caliphs's palace, where troops other than palace guards were quartered and workshops, storehouses, and stables were located. Bosworth is, however, referring to Baghdad during the Caliph al-Muʿtaḍid's reign (279–89/892–902); in Sāmarrā, Public Audience Hall seems an appropriate designation for the Arabic phrase.

316. The critical apparatus notes an additional phrase taken from ʿUyūn al-akhbār: Al-Dūlābī related that the brother of Bāyakbāk arrived with Khanjar and drank from the [Caliph's] blood.

317. Ṭabarī does not mention the name of the transmitter, but it seems plausible to assume that it is a continuation of Muḥammad b. ʿĪsā's account.

318. That is, the rebel al-Ḥasan b. Zayd.

At this Abū Naṣr replied rudely, "Let what he and his family have acquired since you became Caliph be assessed and restored to their owners, and then do the same for what you and your brothers have acquired!" Al-Muhtadī ordered him arrested, beaten, and imprisoned; his palace was plundered along with that of Ibn Thawābah. A bounty was put on the heads of al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad, Ibn Thawābah, and Mufliḥ's secretary, Sulaymān b. Wahb al-Qaṭṭān, who fled in consequence; their palaces were also stripped bare.

Following this, al-Muhtadī brought together the various groups of Farāghinah, the Ushrūsaniyyah, the Ṭabariyyah, the Daylamites, the Ishtākhaniyyah, and the remnants of the Turks of al-Karkh and the clan of Waṣīf and sought their support against Mūsā and Mufliḥ. He argued that they had expropriated much wealth and monopolized the tax revenue, and moreover that he was afraid they were plotting [1833] to kill him. "If you help me," he said, "I shall pay all that is owing to you and increase the level of your allotments." At this they agreed to assist him against Mūsā and his forces. As they remained in the Jawsaq palace, they renewed their oath of allegiance to him. Al-Muhtadī ordered barley meal and sugar to be purchased for them and each man was paid a daily rate of two dirhams, and given a frequent ration of bread and meat. The army command was entrusted to Aḥmad b. Waṣīf and ʿAbdallāh b. Bughā al-Sharābī.

The Banū Hāshim rallied to them, and together with al-Muhtadī they set out riding through the markets appealing to people for help saying, "These godless ones who slay caliphs and maltreat their own mawlās are the same who have appropriated the tax revenue for themselves; so support and aid the Commander of the Faithful." Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAlī b. Yaʿqūb b. al-Manṣūr and other members of the Banū Hāshim spoke to people in a similar fashion. Al-Muhtadī later wrote to Bāyakbāk with orders to take over as commander of the whole army and to arrest Mūsā and Mufliḥ.

After al-Muhtadī's death, people searched for Abū Naṣr [Muḥammad] b. Bughā, thinking he was still alive. When they were at last led to the spot where he was buried and he was disinterred, his body was found to have been butchered. The remains were taken to his family for Bāyakbāk's body was also taken and buried. The Turks broke a thousand swords over Muḥammad b. Bughā's grave in accordance with their custom when a chief died.

It was said that when al-Muhtadī refused to abdicate, his testicles were ordered crushed until he died.

It was also said that, when al-Muhtadī faced his executioners, he uttered these words:

"Were I able, I would be determined, but there was an obstacle between intent and execution of the act."[319]

[1834] The day that Muḥammad b. Bughā was imprisoned nothing [else] was done to him. Restitution was demanded and he paid nearly twenty thousand dinars. After ripping open his belly and wringing his neck, they put him to death. His body was thrown into a well of the underground canal system, remaining there until the day after they took al-Muhtadī into custody when the mawlās extracted it for burial.

Al-Muhtadī's caliphate, to the very end of his reign, lasted exactly eleven months and twenty-five days.[320] He was then thirty-eight years old. He was a man of wide and elegant forehead, and austere gray-blue eyes, short and rotund, broad-shouldered, and with a long beard. He was born in al-Qāṭūl.[321]

In this year Juʿlān arrived in al-Baṣrah to take on the leader of the Zanj.[322]

News of [the] Encounter [between Juʿlān and the Zanj]

Following his arrival in al-Baṣrah, Juʿlān reportedly advanced with his army from the city until he was just a farsakh[323] distant from the Zanj army. There he had a trench excavated to enclose his forces where he remained for six months. Al-Zaynabī, Burayh, the Banū Hāshim, and other Baṣrans who were prepared to fight the abominable one were sent forth on the day that Juʿlān promised them he would attack the Zanj. But, when the two sides met, they only threw

319. Literally "a barrier between the wild ass and escape."

320. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 233, has fifteen days.

321. See Le Strange, Lands, 57.

322. Popovic, Révolte, 93. Popovic observes that at this point, with the Caliph's despatch of a Turkish officer commanding government troops, the Zanj revolt had lost its local character and had become "an affair of state."

323. About 6 km.

stones and shot arrows at each other, and Ju'lān found he could not proceed owing to the dense stand of palm trees and undergrowth, which allowed no room for the horses upon which most of his troops were mounted.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported that after Ju'lān had spent some time thus entrenched, the Zanj leader said he had decided to conceal some of his troops along the approach roads to the trench and then [1835] launch a night attack upon him. The result of the attack was that a number of Ju'lān's men were killed and the rest were gripped with such terror that Ju'lān left the camp to return to al-Baṣrah. Now prior to the abominable one's nocturnal attacks against Ju'lān, al-Zaynabī had collected fighters from the Bilāliyyah and Sa'diyyah factions and despatched them to Ju'lān from the districts of the Nahr Nāfidh and Hazārdar, so as to confront the Zanj from two sides. However, they offered no resistance when they encountered the Zanj whose victory left many of them dead while the rest fled in disarray. Ju'lān escaped to al-Baṣrah and remained there, which made his weakness apparent to the central authorities.

Thus, Ju'lān was removed from responsibility for fighting the abominable one, and Sa'īd al-Ḥājib was ordered to proceed to undertake the task.

In this year the Zanj leader transferred [his headquarters] from the salt flats where he had established himself on the western side of the Nahr Abī al-Khaṣīb.[324]

In this year as well the Zanj leader reportedly seized fourteen seacraft, which had formed part of a convoy heading for al-Baṣrah. When news of the Zanj raids on the waterways reached the boats' owners, they proposed binding their boats one to the other so as to form a kind of island linking the first craft to the last, which they could then sail along the Tigris. The abominable one got wind of this and detailed some of his troops to capture the flotilla, encouraging them by saying it was easy prey.

Abū al-Ḥasan said that he has heard the Zanj leader comment, "When news of the approaching boats reached me, I went to say my [1836] prayers. I had begun my humble petition for God's assistance when a voice addressed me, saying that I had been granted a great victory. Scarcely a moment later, I turned round and caught sight of the boats and my troops heading toward them in flat-bottomed craft. They quickly overwhelmed the boats, killed the fighters on board, captured slaves, and plundered vast treasure, the extent of which could not be counted or even estimated." For three days the Zanj were allowed to carry on in this fashion, after which their leader ordered anything left to be delivered to him.

324. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 304. It was at this place around this time that the Zanj leader built his capital, al-Mukhtārah. The canal takes its name from a freedman of the Caliph al-Manṣūr who was granted lands here in fief. According to the Index, it was also known as Nahr al-Atrāk.

On the 25th of Rajab (June 28, 870) of this year the Zanj occupied al-Ubullah, killing many of the inhabitants and burning the city.

An Account of the Zanj Occupation of al-Ubullah[325]

At the time Ju'lān had withdrawn from the trench he had constructed in Shāṭi' 'Uthmān and returned to al-Baṣrah, the Zanj leader reportedly harassed the inhabitants of al-Ubullah with several brigades of troops, attacking them with infantry from the direction of Shāṭi' 'Uthmān and from the commandeered boats from the Tigris. His troops then turned toward the Nahr Ma'qil.[326]

The Zanj leader reportedly said that he hestitated whether to head for 'Abbādān[327] or al-Ubullah but decided in favor of the former. He entrusted the task to some of his men but was then told that the nearest enemy with regard to abode and the most fitting one to concentrate on to the exclusion of anything else were the inhabitants of al-Ubullah. "Therefore," he said, "the army that I had despatched against 'Abbādān I recalled and redirected to al-Ubullah."

The Zanj continued fighting the populace of al-Ubullah until Wednesday evening, the 25th of Rajab (June 28, 870). That night the [1837] Zanj stormed the city from the Tigris side and the Nahr al-Ubullah. Abū al-Aḥwaṣ and his son were killed in the fighting, while the city was put to the torch. As the buildings were constructed of teakwood and built close together, the fire swept through the city, causing a violent wind, while the sparks of the conflagration spread as far as

325. Popovic, Révolte, 94–96; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 236–37.

326. The chief waterway of the nine canals lying on the western side of the Tigris estuary and the one through which ships reached al-Baṣrah from the north. It was named after a Companion of the Prophet. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 303, 305.

327. See Le Strange, Lands, 43, 44.

Shāṭi' 'Uthmān and engulfed it. Many were slain and many others drowned. Much booty was secured but more goods perished in the flames than were plundered. That evening 'Abdallāh b. Ḥumayd al-Ṭūsī and one of his sons, who were aboard a barge on the Nahr Ma'qil with Abū Ḥamzah Nuṣayr, were killed.

This year the inhabitants of 'Abbādān also surrendered to the Zanj leader and yielded their citadel to him.

The Account of [the Zanj Leader's] Summons for [the] Surrender [of the Inhabitants of 'Abbādān]

The reason for this was that when the Zanj had dealt with the inhabitants of al-Ubullah in the manner they had, the 'Abbādānians' resolve weakened, and they feared for their lives and their families. Therefore they gave themselves over to the Zanj and surrendered their city to the abominable one. His troops occupied it and seized the slaves [al-'abīd] and weapons they found there; the abominable one distributed among his troops the weapons that they brought to him.

In this year as well the Zanj occupied al-Ahwāz and captured Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir.[328]

An Account of [the Occupation of al-Ahwāz]

The reason for this was that following the actions of the Zanj in al-Ubullah and the surrender of the inhabitants of 'Abbādān to the abominable one,[329] he next set his ambitions on al-Ahwāz. He had attached the 'Abbādānians' slaves [mamālīk] to his own Zanj troops, while distributing among them as well the weapons that had been seized from the city.

The Zanj troops eagerly set off for Jubbā. The population offered [1838] no resistance and fled from the Zanj, who entered the town, killing, 328. Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir was the brother of the celebrated Aḥmad b. al-Mudabbir, financial administrator under the Ṭulūnids in Egypt. See EI,[2] s.v. "Ibn al-Mudabbir."

329. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 237, who has consistently referred to 'Alī b. Muḥammad as "the Zanj leader," avoiding the pejorative epithets used by Ṭabarī, calls him here al-'Alawī al-Baṣrī, the Baṣran 'Alid, as though conferring an honorific title of conqueror upon him.

burning, and pillaging. They also laid waste the environs of Jubbā, arriving at last before al-Ahwāz. The governor there at the time was Sa'īd b. Yaksīn, who was also in charge of defense matters; Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. al-Mudabbir was in charge of the bureaus of taxes and estates. The population of al-Ahwāz also fled from the Zanj, and almost no one offered resistance. Sa'īd b. Yaksīn withdrew with his soldiers, but Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir remained behind with his pages and servants. The Zanj entered and occupied the city. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, who had received a blow to the head, was captured and all his possessions, including money, furnishings, and slaves (raqīq), were seized. This was on Monday the 12th of Ramaḍān in the year 256 (August 13, 870).

Following these events in al-Ubullah and al-Ahwāz the Baṣrans were in such a state of dread that many evacuated the city for various other places, as disquieting rumors spread among the common people.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah (October 30–November 28, 870) of this year the Zanj leader sent an army commanded by Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī to fight Shāhīn b. Bisṭām.[330] But, as Yaḥyā failed to achieve his objective, he returned from the campaign.

In Rajab (June 4–July 3, 870) of this year Sa'īd b. Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥājib arrived in al-Baṣrah to wage war against the Zanj on behalf of the central authorities.

In this year as well there occurred a battle between the troops of [1839] Mūsā b. Bughā who had gone with him to the district of al-Jabal in revolt against Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq and Musāwir b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd the Khārijite. The battle took place in Khāniqīn.[331] Musāwir greatly outnumbered Mūsā and his two hundred men, yet they were able to rout Musāwir and slay a large number of his troops.

---

330. He was the secretary attached to Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā who had replaced Sa'īd b. Yaksīn in his post in al-Ahwāz. For the account of Shāhīn's death, see pp. 123–25, below.

331. A city on the road to Ḥulwān, to the northeast of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 62–63.

The Events of the Year 256 (cont'd)

(December 9, 869–November 28, 870)

In this year the oath of allegiance was rendered to Aḥmad b. Abī Jaʿfar, who was known as Ibn Fityān. He was given the regnal title al-Muʿtamid ʿalā-Allāh. The ceremony took place on Tuesday, the 16th of Rajab (June 19, 870).

In the same year news was despatched to Mūsā b. Bughā, who was then in Khāniqīn, about the death of Muḥammad b. al-Wāthiq and also that the oath of allegiance had been given to al-Muʿtamid as Caliph. Mūsā arrived in Sāmarrā on the 20th of Rajab (June 23, 870).

On the 2nd of Shaʿbān (July 5, 870) ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān was appointed vizier.[332]

In the same year ʿAlī b. Zayd al-Ṭālibī[333] appeared in al-Kūfah. Al-Shāh b. Mikāl was sent with a large army to fight him, and ʿAlī and his troops met and routed him, killing a great many of his troops. Al-Shāh, however, managed to escape.

---

332. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 305–9. The text has ʿAbdallāh; the correct name is found in Manuscript C.

333. A descendant of al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, he is first reported raising a rebellion in al-Kūfah in Rajab 255 (June 869); Ṭabarī III, 1709. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 238–39, mentions another ʿAlid revolt that occurred at this time, this one in Upper Egypt, which caused the governor, Ibn Ṭulūn, to send a force to quell it.

Again in this same year, Muḥammad b. Wāṣil b. Ibrāhīm al-Tamīmī,[334] an inhabitant of Fārs, together with a Kurd called Aḥmad b. al-Layth, who was from the same region, attacked al-Ḥārith b. Sīmā al-Sharābī, the governor of Fārs. In the ensuing battle al-Ḥārith was killed, and this allowed Muḥammad b. Wāṣil to conquer Fārs.

[1840] Mufliḥ was sent into battle against Musāwir the Khārijite in this year as well.[335] Kanjūr was also despatched to fight ʿAlī b. Zayd al-Ṭālibī in al-Kūfah.[336]

The army of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd al-Ṭālibī conquered al-Rayy in the month of Ramaḍān (August 2 to 31, 870) of this year.

On the 11th of Shawwāl of this year (September 11, 870), Mūsā b. Bughā departed from Sāmarrā for al-Rayy with al-Muʿtamid publicly bidding him farewell.

In this year a battle occurred between Amājūr and one of the sons of ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh[337] at the gate of Damascus. I heard a report from someone attending Amājūr that, on the day the skirmish took place, he had prepared an expeditionary force for himself and departed from the city of Damascus. At the same moment the son of ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh and one of his commanders called Abū al-Ṣahbāʾ were with their own forces in the vicinity of Damascus. They received intelligence of Amājūr's departure with a small contingent of troops. Spoiling for a fight, they advanced toward Amājūr, who was unaware of their approach until they were upon him. The two sides engaged in fierce hand-to-hand combat and Abū al-Ṣahbāʾ was killed. The rest of his troops and those of Ibn ʿĪsā were put to flight. I heard it 334. For these developments, see Bosworth, "Ṭāhirids," 112–13, where the name is given as Muḥammad b. Wāṣil al-Ḥanẓalī.

335. The battle, according to Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 240, occurred in the Khāniqīn district. Mufliḥ, facing greater numbers of the enemy, nevertheless managed to slay many of the Khārijite forces.

336. Kanjūr succeeded in driving the ʿAlid from al-Kūfah and pursued him as far as Junbulā, where he defeated the rebel and captured many of his men, in Dhū al-Ḥijjah 256 (October 30–November 28, 870). See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 239–40, where the account of Kanjūr is complete. Ṭabarī mentions the circumstances of his death later under events of 259/872–73, p. 150, below.

337. Ibn al-Athīr's account, Kāmil, VII, 238, is clearer than Ṭabarī's, although differing slightly in some details. ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh had been appointed over Damascus; he appropriated a sum of 700,000 dinars, which had been sent from Egypt en route to Baghdad and then claimed to have distributed it to his troops. The Caliph al-Muʿtamid sent Amājūr to Damascus as governor with a thousand troops. As Amājūr approached the city, he encountered the greater force of Manṣūr, ʿĪsā's son who was defeated and killed. ʿĪsā himself escaped toward Armenia, and Amājūr took control of Damascus.

mentioned that on that day the forces of Ibn ʿĪsā and Abū al-Ṣaḥbā' combined were about twenty thousand men, whereas Amājūr had only some two to four hundred men.

On Wednesday, the 13th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (November 11, 870), Abū Aḥmad (al-Muwaffaq), the son of al-Mutawakkil, set out from Mecca for Sāmarrā.

In the same year Abū Naṣr Ismāʿīl b. ʿAbdallāh al-Marwazī, the judge Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Kurayzī and al-Ḥusayn the eunuch, otherwise known as ʿAraq al-Mawt,[338] were sent to ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh in order to offer him the governorship of Armenia,[339] on condition that he leave Syria, he being given a pledge of safe-conduct to do so. ʿĪsā accepted and set out from Syria for Armenia.[340] [1841]

Leading the pilgrimage in this year was Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr.[341]

---

338. "[Smelling of the] sweat of death" is an approximation to the meaning of the man's name.

339. See EI,[2] s.v. "Armīniya."

340. The details in the paragraphs here are not recounted by Ibn al-Athīr. See n. 335, above.

341. Great-grandson of the Caliph al-Manṣūr; he was known as Kaʿb al-Baqar. This appears to have been the first pilgrimage he led. His father had performed the same office in 252/865.

The Events of the Year

257

(November 29, 870–November 18, 871)

Among the significant events of this year was the arrival in Fārs of Ya'qūb b. al-Layth. In Sha'bān of this year (June 24–July 22, 871) al-Mu'tamid sent to him a delegation comprising Ṭughtā and Ismā'īl b. Isḥāq and Abū Sa'īd al-Anṣārī. Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil also despatched to him confirmation of the governorship of Balkh and Ṭukhāristān including adjacent areas in Kirmān, Sijistān, Sind, and elsewhere, together with the stipulation of the annual amount of his revenue. Ya'qūb accepted these arrangements and departed.

In Rabī' II (February 26–March 26, 871) of this year, one of Ya'qūb's messengers arrived [in Sāmarrā] with idols he had reportedly seized from Kābul.

On the 12th of Ṣafar (January 9, 871) al-Mu'tamid conferred upon his brother Abū Aḥmad[342] the overall control of al-Kūfah, the Mecca

342. Known by the honorific title of al-Muwaffaq; he was unlike many of the 'Abbāsid family in that he seems to have embarked upon a military career from an early age. He retained close links with the Turkish commander Mūsā b. Bughā, with whose help he rebuilt the army's strength in order to conduct the campaign aginst the Zanj. He was appointed commander-in-chief of the army in Ṣafar 257 (December 29, 870–January 26, 871). See Popovic, Révolte, 104; Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 307–25.

Road, the Ḥaramayn,[343] and the Yemen. Later, on the 7th of Ramaḍān (July 29, 871), Baghdad, the Sawād, Wāsiṭ, the districts of the Tigris, al-Baṣrah, al-Ahwāz, and Fārs were added to the others. The Caliph ordered that the governor of Baghdad take administrative charge of [1842] Abū Aḥmad's districts. He also conferred upon Yārjūkh control of al-Baṣrah, the Tigris districts, al-Yamāmah and al-Baḥrayn in place of Saʿīd b. Ṣāliḥ. Yārjūkh then appointed Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar b. Dīnār as administrator of al-Baṣrah and the Tigris districts and other areas adjacent to al-Ahwāz.

Also in the same year, Bughrāj was commissioned to press Saʿīd (b. Ṣāliḥ) al-Ḥājib to proceed to the Tigris and station himself opposite the army camp of the Zanj leader.[344] Bughrāj did so and Saʿīd carried out this task in the month of Rajab (May 25–June 23, 871) of this year. It was reported that when Saʿīd reached the Nahr Maʿqil he found the forces of the Zanj leader there at a canal called the Murghāb,[345] one of the tributaries of the Nahr Maʿqil, Saʿīd engaged the Zanj in battle and routed them; he also managed to free women who had been held prisoner among them, as well as seizing booty. During the encounter Saʿīd received some wounds, one of them in the mouth. Afterward he departed for a spot known as the army camp of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr[346] and remained there one night. Next he moved on and camped at a place called Haṭmah[347] in the Euphrates valley. He remained there for some days, inspecting his troops and preparing them for a further encounter with the Zanj leader. During his sojourn in Haṭmah, word reached Saʿīd that an army of the Zanj leader was in the Euphrates area. So with a contingent of his own troops, he headed for the Zanj and succeeded in routing them. Among the defeated was ʿImrān, who was married to the grandmother of Ankalāy, son of the Zanj leader. This ʿImrān sought a pledge of safe-conduct from Bughrāj, after which the sides dispersed.

---

343. That is, the two holy cities of Mecca and Medina. See EI,[2] s.v. "al-Ḥaramayn."
344. See Popovic, Révolte, 97.
345. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 499.
346. Named after the former ʿAbbāsid Caliph.
347. Manuscript C has Hamṭah; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 242, calls it Haṭṭah and places it on the eastern side of the Tigris. The location cannot be identified, and, as this instance illustrates, many of the locations (and their correct names) that appear in connection with the Zanj uprising in the vast southern Iraqi swamplands were unfamiliar, even to a contemporary writer like Ṭabarī.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said: "Once I saw a woman from among the inhabitants of the Euphrates valley who discovered one of the Zanj concealed in some dense underbrush. She seized him and [1843] brought him without resistance to Sa'īd's camp." Later Sa'īd set out again to fight the abominable one. He crossed over to the western side of the Tigris and engaged him in several skirmishes over a period of days. Sa'īd then returned to his camp in Haṭmah and from there pursued the struggle against the abominable one throughout the remainder of Rajab and most of Sa'īd [from early June through mid-July 871].

In the same year Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. al-Mudabbir[348] escaped from prison where he had been detained by the abominable one. The reason for this was that he had reportedly been confined to one room in the residence of Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī. As al-Baḥrānī felt cramped in these quarters, Ibrāhīm was moved to an apartment in his palace and locked up there. Two men who lived in an adjacent building to that in which Ibrāhīm was held were put in charge of him. Ibrāhīm went to considerable lengths to excite the mens' cupidity. They ran a tunnel from their own quarters to the place where Ibrāhīm was confined, and both he and his nephew called Abū Ghālib made their escape along with a man from the Banū Hāshim who had been imprisoned with them.

During the course of the year the abominable one's forces fought against those of Sa'īd, who himself was killed along with many of his followers.

An Account of the Battle [between Sa'īd al-Ḥājib and the Zanj]

It was reported that the abominable one sent orders to Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī, who at the time was stationed on the Nahr Ma'qil with a large army, for him to proceed by night with a thousand of his troops toward Sa'īd's army. The force was to be commanded by Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and Abū al-Layth al-Iṣbahānī. They were instructed to attack Sa'īd at the break of dawn. Sulaymān and Abū al-Layth set out for Sa'īd's army to execute their orders and happened to encounter him quite unprepared. In the ensuing battle a large number of Saʿīd's troops were slain, the Zanj on that occasion burn-[1844] ing Saʿīd's camp to the ground and thereby gravely weakening his position.

348. See n. 328, above; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 242.

Owing to the night attacks the Zanj launched against them, Saʿīd's camp was thrown into a state of confusion. A complicating factor was the withholding of the soldiers' allotments, which had been assigned[349] to them from the revenue of al-Ahwāz. Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar al-Khayyāṭ, who was then in charge of military affairs in al-Ahwāz as well as having a hand in matters of taxes, had delayed the payment of the soldiers' allotments. When the position of Saʿīd b. Ṣāliḥ had deteriorated to such an extent, he was ordered to depart for the court in [Sāmarrā][350] and surrender both the army and his administrative duties to Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar. Saʿīd eventually carried out these instructions, although he had been unable to move following the night attacks of the Zanj and their burning his camp, until he was relieved of his duties.

In this same year there occurred a battle between Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar al-Khayyāṭ and the Zanj leader, during which many of Manṣūr's troops were slain.

An Account of the Battle [between Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar and the Zanj]

It was reported that when Saʿīd al-Ḥājib had been removed from his post in al-Baṣrah, Bughrāj remained behind to protect its inhabitants. Manṣūr began to organize the supply ships, having them escorted by barge as far as al-Baṣrah. As a result, the Zanj were low on provisions. Then Manṣūr mustered his troops and added to the barges he had the Jannābī[351] barges and other boats. He headed in the direction of the Zanj leader's army camp, scaled the walls of a castle located beside the Tigris, and burned it to the ground and everything around it. Approaching from the same side he entered the Zanj encampment. The Zanj lay in ambush for them and attacked and killed 349. Subbibat lahum. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CCLXXXIV, and n. 57 above.

350. The text reads Bāb al-Sulṭān, headquarters of the central authorities.

351. The reading is uncertain; the word in manuscript B is unpointed, while C reads al-Ḥan(n)āniyyāt. Jannābī barges would have been made in the city of Jannāba, located on the coast of the province of Fārs. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CLXXI; Le Strange, Lands, 259.

a large number of [Manṣūr's] troops while the rest sought escape in the waters of the Tigris where many more were drowned. On that occasion about five hundred heads were reportedly borne away to the camp of Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī on the Nahr Ma'qil, where he ordered them publicly displayed. [1845]

In the same year, at a place called Birkat Zalzal, a strangler from Baghdad was apprehended. He had murdered a number of women and buried them in the house where he was living. He was brought to al-Mu'tamid, and I learned that he had ordered the prisoner whipped. He was given two thousand lashes and four hundred strokes with a bastinado, yet he continued to live. Only when the executioners beat his testicles with two wooden flogging posts ['uqābayn][352] did he finally expire. His body was then returned to Baghdad, where it was strung up in the public view; the corpse was later burned.[353]

In this year Shāhīn b. Bisṭām was killed and Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā put to flight.[354]

The Death of Shāhīn b. Bisṭām and the Flight of Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā

Al-Baḥrānī had reportedly written to the abominable one advising the despatch of an army to accupy al-Ahwāz and arousing his interest in such a plan. He suggested the operation commence with the destruction of the Arbuk bridge [qanṭarah][355] to prevent the [enemy's] cavalry[356] from reaching his army. The abominable one sent 'Alī b. Abān to destroy the bridge. 'Alī was met by Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā, who was returning from Fārs where he had been with al-Ḥārith b. Sīmā[357] in a tract of desert known as the Dast Arbuk, which was situated between al-Ahwāz and the aforementioned bridge.

---

352. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. '-q-b. Al-'uqābān are two pieces of wood stuck in the ground, between which a man is extended to be flogged.

353. This tale seems curously out of place amid the narrative of events of greater import to the state; it was one that evidently caught Ṭabarī's personal interest.

354. See Popovic, Révolte, 96–98; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 243–44.

355. This was the only bridge crossing the Dujayl. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 185.

356. Al-Khayl. A feminine singular noun with the collective meaning "horses" and in a metonymous sense "mounted troops." See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. kh-y-l; and EI,[1] s.v. "Khayl." The verb in the sentence should be emended to taṣil.

357. The governor of Fārs, as mentioned p. 116, above.

When 'Alī b. Abān reached the bridge he and his troops established a camp hidden from view. However, when Ibrāhīm's cavalry had crossed this desert tract they were able to attack 'Alī from several sides and as a result a great number of the Zanj were slain. 'Alī himself was forced to flee. Ibrāhīm's cavalry pursued him as far as [1846] al-Fandam[358] but a foot wound prevented 'Alī from proceeding farther toward al-Ahwāz. Therefore he backtracked and headed for Jubbā.[359]

Sa'īd b. Yaksīn was removed from his post and Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā was appointed [to combat the Zanj].[360] His secretary was Shāhīn. The two men set out at the same time, Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā taking the Euphrates Road and heading for the mouth of the Nahr Jubbā.[361] 'Alī b. Abān was at this moment in al-Khayzurāniyyah.[362] For his part, Shāhīn b. Bisṭām set out along the Nahr Mūsā road, judging that he would meet up with Ibrāhīm at a spot they had previously agreed upon. They had also made prior arrangements to attack 'Alī b. Abān, and Shāhīn arrived at the spot first. Now an inhabitant of the Nahr Mūsā district came to 'Alī b. Abān and informed him of Shāhīn's approach. 'Alī advanced toward Shāhīn, and the two sides met in the afternoon at the Abū al-'Abbās canal, situated between the Nahr Mūsā and the Nahr Jubbā. Battle broke out between the two sides. At first Shāhīn's troops held fast and fought fiercely. But then, recovering, the Zanj dealt their opponents a crushing blow, causing them to turn heel and flee. In fact the first to fall mortally wounded that day were Shāhīn himself and a cousin of his named Ḥayyān; this was because he had been in the vanguard of the troops. A great many of his men were slain as well.

Another informant came to 'Alī b. Abān and told him of Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā's arrival. This was after 'Alī's battle with Shāhīn was over. Without delay 'Alī departed for the Nahr Jubbā, where Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā's army was camped. As yet Ibrāhīm had heard no word of Shāhīn's fate. At the time of the last evening prayer, 'Alī drew in

358. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 278, places this in [the district] of al-Ahwāz and adds, "But I don't know what it is."

359. A town lying on a canal of the same name, east of the Dujayl and below al-Ahwāz in an area occupied by many villages. See Le Strange, Lands, 243.

360. Ibrāhīm was appointed to replace Sa'īd as military governor of al-Ahwāz.

361. The text of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 243, has incorrectly, Nahr Jayy.

362. A town on the eastern side of the Tigris above Fam al-Ṣilḥ, in the district of Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 301.

close upon Ibrāhīm's position and then attacked ferociously, slaying his troops in droves. Thus in the brief span of time between the afternoon and evening prayers, Shāhīn had been killed and Ibrāhīm routed.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said that he had once heard ʿAlī b. Abān talking of these events. He said, "That day, as it happened, I had [1847] come down with one of the bouts of fever to which I was subject. When my troops had achieved their victory over Shāhīn, they dispersed so that there were only about fifty left with me when I set out for Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā's army camp. When I reached it, I got close enough to hear the commotion of the soldiers and even some of their conversations. When the place fell quiet, I went onto the attack."

ʿAlī b. Abān left Jubbā when Shāhīn had been killed and Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā routed, after a despatch arrived for him from the abominable one with orders to proceed to al-Baṣrah and wage war against its inhabitants.

In this year the troops of the abominable one entered al-Baṣrah.

The Events that Led up to [the] Entry of al-Baṣrah [by the Zanj] and What Transpired Thereafter[363]

It was reported that, when Saʿīd b. Ṣāliḥ (al-Ḥājib) left al-Baṣrah, the central authorities handed over his duties to Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar al-Khayyāṭ. The events concerning Manṣūr and the troops of the abominable one we have dealt with already: They told of Manṣūr's enfeebled position, his inability to engage the abominable one in battle, contenting himself with providing protection for the supply ships[364] sufficient to relieve the inhabitants of al-Baṣrah of the harm caused when the flow of these supplies was interrupted. Word of this reached the abominable one, who was then frustrated by the news that the Baṣrans had been relieved. This caused him to send ʿAlī b. Abān to the districts of Jubbā, where he established camp in al-Khayzurāniyyah. This distracted Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar from the protection of the supply boats to al-Baṣrah, so once again the Baṣrans [1848] experienced straitened circumstances.

The abominable one's troops harassed the inhabitants of al-Baṣ-

363. See Popovic, Révolte, 98–104; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 244–46.
364. Al-Qayrawānāt. See n. 211, above.

rah day and night with attacks. Then, in the month of Shawwāl [August 22–September 19, 871] of this year, the abominable one determined to rally his forces together for a concerted assault on the Baṣrans and a serious [attempt to] destroy it. The decision was taken because he was aware of their weakness, their disunity, and the damaging effects upon them of the blockade and the destruction of surrounding villages. Moreover, the abominable one had consulted the astrological charts and discovered that there would be a lunar eclipse on Tuesday evening, the 14th of the month (September 4, 871).

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Sahl reported that he had heard the abominable one say, "I earnestly prayed to God for help against the people of al-Baṣrah and humbly beseeched Him to hasten its destruction. A voice addressed me saying that al-Baṣrah was but a loaf of bread, which one could nibble around the edges; when half the loaf had been devoured, al-Baṣrah would be destroyed. I took this to mean that devouring half a loaf indicated the eclipse of the moon, which was expected at this time, so it was entirely plausible that the fate of al-Baṣrah would occur soon afterward."

Muḥammad continued: "The abominable one continued speaking in this vein to such an extent that he overwhelmed his followers with the story, repeating it among them ad nauseam. Then he deputized Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Dārimī, one of his adherents in al-Baḥrayn, to go among the Arab tribesmen, many of whom were successfully won over to the Zanj cause. They camped at a place called al-Qandal, and the abominable one sent Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Shaʿrānī to join them, and then ordered the whole force to head for al-Baṣrah and attack it. He forwarded instructions to Sulaymān b. Mūsā to drill the tribesmen in the execution of such an operation.

[1849] When the lunar eclipse occurred, the Zanj leader sent ʿAlī b. Abān with a detachment of Arab tribesmen, ordering him to approach al-Baṣrah by way of the territory of the Banū Saʿd. Likewise Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī, who was then blockading the Baṣrans, was instructed to approach the city via the Nahr ʿAdī with the remainder of the tribesmen who were attached to him."

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said that Shibl [b. Sālim] had observed that the first attack on the Baṣrans was led by ʿAlī b. Abān. This was at the time when Bughrāj was present in the city with a detachment of soldiers. For two days the battle raged between the two sides, the people in general supporting Bughrāj. Yaḥyā [b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī] approached with his troops by way of Qaṣr Anas, making their way to the bridge. ʿAlī b. Abān al-Muhallabī entered the city at the time of the Friday congregational prayers on the 17th of Shawwāl [September 7, 871]. Killing and burning continued through the day and into the evening and throughout all of Saturday as well. Yaḥyā approached al-Baṣrah early on Sunday morning. Bughrāj and Burayh with a force of troops blocked his way and drove him back. Yaḥyā returned and held his ground for the rest of the day. On Monday morning he [Yaḥyā] made a further attempt, but, when he finally secured entry into the city, the defenders had scattered, Burayh had fled, and Bughrāj had withdrawn with his troops, leaving no opposition. Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā al-Muhallabī met Yaḥyā and sought a promise of protection from him on behalf of the inhabitants and this was granted.

Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā's town crier proclaimed the protection to anyone who sought it; he had only to present himself at Ibrāhīm's palace. The inhabitants of al-Baṣrah responded without exception, thronging the city squares. When he saw[365] the great gathering, he seized the opportunity to blockade every street, roadway, and alley, thus preventing anyone from escaping. Behaving in this treacherous manner, he then gave the order for his troops to kill, and, with rare exceptions, everyone present was slain. The perpetrator of this act departed the same day to stay in Qaṣr ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar in al-Khuraybah. [1850]

Muḥammad continued: Al-Faḍl b. ʿAdī al-Dārimī recounted to me the following: "At the time the traitor[366] was warring against the people of al-Baṣrah, I was in the district, staying among the Banū Saʿd." Al-Faḍl continued, saying that someone had arrived one night and mentioned that he had seen some passing cavalry heading for Qaṣr ʿĪsā in al-Khuraybah. [Al-Faḍl said], "My companions said to me, 'Go and gather some information for us about this troop.' I did so, and, when I came upon a part of the Banū Tamīm and the Banū Asad, I inquired what they were doing. They claimed to be supporters of the ʿAlawite and attached to ʿAlī b. Abān, who was supposed to reach al-Baṣrah the following morning, his destination being the quarter of the Banū Sa'd. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad was also with another contingent, heading for the quarter of the Āl al-Muhallab. They said to me, 'Tell your companions from the Banū Sa'd, "If you wish to protect your women and children, then make haste to evacuate them before the army surrounds you." ' "

365. The subject of the verb here is unclear. Grammatical requirements point to Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā as the perpetrator of the ensuing massacre, but it was certainly the work of Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī. See p. 131, below, for another account.

366. Ṭabarī uses the word khāʾin for the Zanj leader, a change from the monotonous khabīth, "abominable one."

Al-Faḍl said, "I returned to my companions and gave them the news from the Arab tribesmen." Having made their preparations, they sent someone to Burayh to inform him, too, of the situation. He came to them at dawn with the remaining chattels and a contingent of soldiers. They then marched out until they eventually reached a trench called Banū Ḥimmān. Some Banū Tamīm and fighters of the Sa'diyyah met up with them, but it was not long before 'Alī b. Abān overtook them with a contingent of Zanj and Arab tribesmen on horseback. Burayh became alarmed before even encountering this crowd and so he returned to his residence [in al-Baṣrah]. This was as good as admitting defeat. The Banū Tamīm who had gathered now dispersed and 'Alī was able to approach the city unopposed, and he made his way to the quarter of al-Mirbad.[367] Burayh sent word to the Banū Tamīm requesting assistance, and a group of them responded.
[1851] Fighting broke out in al-Mirbad in front of Burayh's palace. Thereupon Burayh fled, and his supporters scattered. The Zanj burned his palace to the ground, having plundered all its contents. The killing continued, the Baṣrans' position having been gravely weakened, while that of the Zanj grew stronger. The sides battled on until the end of the day, when 'Alī reached the congregational mosque and ordered it burned down. Fatḥ, the servant of Abū Shīth, together with a group of Baṣrans, took 'Alī by surprise, and he had to retreat with his men, some of the Zanj being killed. 'Alī thereupon turned back and established his army camp at a place called the graveyard of the Banū Shaybān.

People sought for someone in authority with whom they could join in battle, but none was found. When they looked for Burayh, they discovered that he had fled. On Saturday the Baṣrans realized that 'Alī b. Abān had not returned, but early on Sunday morning he did so, without encountering any opposition, and took al-Baṣrah in triumph.

367. Located at the western gate of al-Baṣrah, it was the quarter where caravans halted and hence was one of the busiest in the city. See Le Strange, Lands, 45; EI,[2] s.v. "al-Baṣrah."

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan related as follows from Muḥammad b. Simʿān: "At the time the Zanj entered al-Baṣrah, I was living in the city. I used to attend the assembly held by Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl, who was known as Burayh. On Friday, the 10th of Shawwāl 257 (August 31, 871), I was there, and Shihāb b. al-ʿAlāʾ al-ʿAnbarī was present as well. I heard Shihāb telling Ibrāhīm that the traitor had sent money and supplies into the desert in order to raise a force from among the Arab tribesmen; that he had in fact managed to muster a large troop of horsemen, and with them and his own Zanj infantry he intended to infiltrate al-Baṣrah. At the time al-Baṣrah was defended by only some fifty cavalry of the government forces under Bughrāj. Burayh told Shihāb that the Arab tribesmen would not venture to act with hostility toward him [because] he was obeyed and respected by the Arabs." [1852]

Ibn Simʿān continued: "I left Burayh's assembly and came across the secretary, Aḥmad b. Ayyūb, whom I overheard talking about Hārūn b. ʿAbd al-Raḥīm al-Shīʿī, who at the time was in charge of the postal service (barīd) in al-Baṣrah. Hārūn confirmed that the traitor, on the 3rd of Shawwāl (August 24, 871), had performed the congregational prayer[368] with nine persons, while al-Baṣrah's leading commanders and its resident governor remained in total ignorance about what the traitor was up to, as I have described."

The blockade had driven the populace to hunger, and disease was on the increase. Conflict erupted in the city between the two factions of the Bilāliyyah and the Saʿdiyyah. Then on Friday morning, the 16th of Shawwāl (September 6, 871) of this year, the traitor's cavalry attacked al-Baṣrah on three fronts, the Banū Saʿd district, al-Mirbad, and al-Khuraybah. ʿAlī b. Abān led the army, which was despatched against al-Mirbad. He had divided his troops into two contingents: One was in the charge of Rafīq, the servant of Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Khāqān, who was ordered to march into the Banū Saʿd district, and the other, with whom he himself remained, 368. The expression is jammaʿa fī tisʿa anfus. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. j-m-ʿ. Although the date was actually a Saturday, the meaning seems to be that ʿAlī b. Muḥammad had the temerity to pray with nine persons (with nine of his companions or with only nine other persons?) in the congregational mosque in al-Baṣrah prior to the final assault and under the noses of the authorities.

set out for al-Mirbad. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Azraq al-Baḥrānī led the cavalry, which was sent to al-Khuraybah, having assembled his troops together on one front. Those Baṣrans of little circumstance who could, despite being exhausted by hunger and the blockade, went out to face each of these divisions. The cavalry accompanying Bughrāj split up into two groups, one of which made for the district of al-Mirbad and the other for al-Khuraybah. Those [of 'Alī's forces] who reached the Banū Sa'd district engaged in battle a contingent of the Sa'diyyah fighters, along with Fatḥ, the slave of Abū Shīth and [1853] his companions, but a few Baṣrans were no match for the assembled forces of the abominable one, whose troops attacked on horse and on foot.

Ibn Sim'ān said: "On that day I was present in the congregational mosque when flames engulfed three areas, Zahrān, al-Mirbad, and Banū Ḥimmān, at the same time, as if they had been set by arsonists at an agreed moment. That was at the beginning of the day, on Friday. The calamity worsened, and Baṣrans were convinced that they were doomed. Those in the main mosque strove to reach their homes as swiftly as possible. I was hastening toward my own house, which was on the Mirbad Road. On the way, fleeing Baṣrans passed me retreating to the great mosque. Al-Qāsim b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān al-Hāshimī brought up their rear, seated upon a donkey and girt with a sword. He cried out to the crowd, 'Woe upon you! Will you surrender your city and your families? This is your enemy who has just entered your city!' But none paid heed to him or listened to his plea, and he went upon his way. Then the Mirbad Road cleared of people, and between those in flight and the Zanj there was empty space as far as the eye could see."

Muḥammad[369] said, "When I saw what was happening, I entered my house and locked the door. From the upper floor of the house I looked down and saw the cavalry of the Arab tribesmen and the Zanj foot soldiers led by a man riding a chestnut horse and carrying a spear bearing a yellow lappet.[370] Sometime later, after I had been taken to the traitor's city, I inquired about the man's identity. 'Alī b. Abān claimed that he had been the one I had seen with the yellow streamer."

---

369. That is, Muḥammad b. Sim'ān.

370. 'Adhabah. Lane, Lexicon, s.v. '-dh-b, describes this as a strip of linen or the like that is bound to the head of a spear.

The [Zanj] troops entered the city and disappeared down the Mirbad Road, proceeding to the ʿUthmān Gate. By then it was late in the day. Then they left. The ignorant young clods of the city imagined that they were off to attend the Friday prayer, but what had really [1854] frightened them off was possible attack from bands of the Bilāliyyah and Saʿdiyyah who might attack them from the square,[371] for they feared ambushes there. So they left.

Those [Zanj] who were in the quarters of Zahrān and Banū Ḥiṣn also departed after they had burned, pillaged, and overwhelmed the city, for they knew no one could stop them. They let Saturday and Sunday go by. Then they came again on Monday, and found no one defending the city. The population[372] was collected before the palace of Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā al-Muhallabī and promised their security.

Muḥammad b. Simʿān recounted the following from al-Ḥasan b. ʿUthmān al-Muhallabī, who was nicknamed Mundaliqah[373] and was one of Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad's companions. That morning Yaḥyā had ordered him to go to the graveyard of the Banū Yashkur and bring back as many ovens[374] as he could fetch. "I did so," said al-Ḥasan, "and brought back some twenty ovens carried on porters' heads. I took them to the palace of Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā, and people thought they were for the purpose of preparing food for them, as they suffered from hunger resulting from the harsh blockade and the strain of events. A crowd developed in front of Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā's palace, people coming and going and increasing in number through the night until sunrise."

Ibn Simʿān continued. "At this time I had moved residence from the Mirbad Road to the palace belonging to my mother's grandfather Hishām, who was called al-Dāff. It was located in the district of the Banū Tamīm; [I did this] because the Banū Tamīm were rumored among the populace to have accepted the traitor's peace. I was there [1855] when some informants brought news of the battle in front of the palace of Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā. They said that Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī had ordered the Zanj to surround the crowd. He allowed any of the Muhallabī family to enter Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥya's palace. A small 371. Al-Murabbaʿah. The reading is uncertain, though some location seems indicated by the context. Manuscript B has al-muʿarabah and C al-muriʿah.

372. Al-nās. The word is typically ambiguous and could also mean the Baṣran troops.

373. The reading is conjectural; manuscript B is unpointed, while C reads s-da-l-ʿ-h.

374. See n. 226, above.

number did so, and the gates were then shut. Finally, the Zanj were given the word to massacre the rest of the crowd, which they proceeded to do, to the very last person."

Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh, known as Abū al-Layth al-Iṣbahānī, was the one who had given the signal[375] to the Zanj, which they recognized as the order to commence the slaughter. The sword did the rest.

Al-Ḥasan b. 'Uthmān said, "I could hear their uproar, crying out 'There is no God but Allāh' as they were put to the sword. Their voices rang out with the cry of 'There is no God but Allāh' so loudly that they could be heard far away, in al-Ṭafāwah." After the crowd had been massacred, as we have described, the Zanj proceeded to slay anyone [else] they encountered. That day 'Alī b. Abān burned down the congregational mosque; he also burned the harbor from the cable (ḥabl)[376] to the bridge, the fire destroying all before it, including people, animals, goods, and merchandise. Throughout the morning and afternoon the Zanj harassed anyone they found, driving everybody to Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad [al-Baḥrānī], who was then residing in Sayḥān; anyone with some money was tortured to extract it and then killed, but anyone who was poor was killed straightaway.

Shibl reportedly said that Yaḥyā entered al-Baṣrah early on Tuesday, following the massacre of the crowd in front of Ibrāhīm b. Yaḥyā's palace. An offer of safety and security was publicly proclaimed, [1856] to try to lure people into the open, but no one appeared. The news reached the abominable one, and he removed 'Alī b. Abān from al-Baṣrah, assigning Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad to the city on his own, sanctioning and approving the massacre, and expressing his affection for him. The abominable one judged 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī's performance lacking in regard to his restraint from seizing booty in the Banū Sa'd district. 'Alī b. Abān had deputed a party of the Banū Sa'd to go to the abominable one, but, as they gained no benefit from him, they departed for 'Abbādān.

Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad remained in al-Baṣrah. The abominable one sent him a despatch ordering the public announcement of Shibl as his deputy in al-Baṣrah in order to calm the fears of the populace and so that those in hiding would begin to reemerge and those who were known to be wealthy. When these reappeared, they were to be forced to reveal the money they had buried and hidden. Yaḥyā carried out this order. Not a day passed when a group of affluent persons was not stripped of their possessions and then put to death. Others of no evident substance were summarily put to death; none who appeared before Yaḥyā survived and many fled as best they could. Finally the abominable one withdrew his army from al-Baṣrah.

375. The signal was a verbal one, which, in the text, reads kīlū, an imperative meaning "measure!" or "weigh!"

376. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CLXXIX.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said, "When the traitor had completed the destruction of al-Baṣrah and word had reached him of the enormities perpetrated by his troops, I heard him comment that he had invoked Allāh's [judgment] upon the populace of al-Baṣrah the day his troops entered the city. He said: 'I prayed earnestly and prostrated myself, praying all the while, and behold I was given a vision of al-Baṣrah. I could see the city and my troops fighting there. I had the vision of a man standing in thin air between earth and the sky in the image of Jaʿfar b. Maʿlūf,[377] who was formerly put in charge of the registry of land taxes in Sāmarrā. He was standing with his left hand lowered and his right hand raised, about to overturn al-Baṣrah [1857] and its inhabitants. I knew then that the angels alone had been charged with the destruction of the city, and not my troops, for had they been responsible for that, the destruction would not have reached the vast proportions people speak about. The angels brought victory and supported me in my battle and kept my troops from being fainthearted.'"

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan continued: "It was following the destruction of al-Baṣrah that the abominable one claimed his descent from Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. ʿAlī,[378] because a large number of ʿAlawites who had been in al-Baṣrah joined his ranks. Among them were ʿAlī b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Zayd and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlī,[379] together with their womenfolk and families. When they joined him, he abandoned his 377. He was involved in the torture and execution of the secretary Najāḥ b. Salamah in 245/857. See Ṭabarī, III, 1442, 1444, 1446, and n. 255, above.

378. Zayd b. ʿAlī, a descendant of the fourth Caliph, ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, had raised a revolt in al-Kūfah against the Umayyad dynasty in 122/740, in which he was killed. His son, Yaḥyā, who participated in the rebellion, escaped to Khurāsān. The Zanj leader here is professing to be the great-grandson of this Yaḥyā. Although by this time his line was extinct, there were descendants from Yaḥyā's half-brothers, whose mother had been a slave. See Popovic, Révolte, 101, and annexes 1 and 2; EI[1] s.v. "Zaid b. ʿAlī."

379. That is, ʿAbdallāh was the son of ʿAlī b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Zayd. When they joined the Zanj, the Zanj leader ʿAlī b. Muḥammad switched his claim of descent claim to be descended from Aḥmad b. 'Īsā, alleging instead to belong to the line of Yaḥyā b. Zayd.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan continued: "When a group of Nawfaliyyūn were with him, I heard al-Qāsim b. al-Ḥasan al-Nawfalī say that they had heard that he was a descendant of Aḥmad b. 'Īsā b. Zayd, but the abominable one replied, 'I am not a descendant of 'Īsā, but of Yaḥyā b. Zayd.' He lied about that; it is generally accepted about Yaḥyā that he had no offspring but a daughter who died in infancy."[380]

In the same year the central government despatched Muḥammad[381] al-Muwallad to al-Baṣrah in order to fight the Zanj leader. He left Sāmarrā on Friday, the 1st of Dhū al-Qa'dah (September 20, 871).

An Account of al-Muwallad's Expedition

Muḥammad al-Muwallad reached the area and was quartered in al-Ubullah.[382] Burayh arrived and established himself in al-Baṣrah. A large number of Baṣrans who had previously fled the city gathered [1858] around Burayh. When Yaḥyā (b. Muḥammad) withdrew from the city, he set up camp on the Nahr al-Ghūthā.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, reporting from Shibl, said that, when Muḥammad al-Muwallad arrived, the abominable one sent Yaḥyā instructions to proceed to the Nahr Awwā. He arrived there with his army and set about engaging al-Muwallad in battle for ten days. Al-Muwallad had selected a place of residence and settled himself in but had devoted less attention to pursuing hostilities. The abominable one ordered Yaḥyā to launch a night attack against him and sent him barges with Abū al-Layth al-Iṣbahānī. Yaḥyā launched the night attack and al-Muwallad ventured forth with his troops. The two sides fought until morning and well into the next afternoon. Then he turned and withdrew while the Zanj entered his camp and from Aḥmad b. 'Īsā b. Zayd to that of Yaḥyā b. Zayd. Ṭabarī is, in fact, saying that the claim was fabricated. Thus the Zanj leader's reason for altering his claim would have been to make it more difficult for opponents and skeptics to challenge its truth, especially if descent from Yaḥyā meant from one of his several half-brothers.

---

380. This is probably a reference to Yaḥyā's daughter by a woman of the Azd tribe, whom he married in al-Kūfah. See EI,[1] s.v. "Zaid b. 'Alī."

381. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 246, refers to him as Aḥmad al-Muwallad.

382. See Popovic, Révolte, 103 n. 2, on the nature of Muḥammad's forces.

plundered it. Yaḥyā sent word of this to the abominable one, who sent further instructions that Yaḥyā should pursue al-Muwallad. Yaḥyā chased after al-Muwallad as far as al-Ḥawānīt[383] before making his way back. He then passed by al-Jāmidah,[384] attacked its inhabitants, and plundered all the neighboring villages, spilling as much blood as he could in the course of the operation. Next he set up his army camp in al-Jālah and remained there a while before returning to the Nahr Maʿqil.

In the same year Muḥammad al-Muwallad captured Saʿīd b. Aḥmad b. Saʿīd b. Salm al-Bāhilī, who, with the aid of his Bāhilite troops, had gained control over the swamp region and made the land routes very insecure.

In this year as well Muḥammad b. Wāṣil violated his allegiance to the central authorities by conquering the province of Fārs.

Leading the pilgimage this year was al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq b. al-Ḥasan b. Ismāʿīl b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās.

In this year Basīl,[385] one of the ruling household, who was known as al-Ṣaqlabī because his mother was a Ṣaqlabī,[386] attacked and killed Michael, the son of Tawfīl, the king of Byzantium. Michael had ruled alone for twenty-four years, and after him the Ṣaqlabī became ruler of Byzantium. [1859]

383. The name means "toll booths," and the place lay on the eastern bank of the Tigris, just north of the great swamp region. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 33, 46.

384. A large village in the Wāsiṭ district. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 274. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 137, notes that Yaḥyā pursued al-Muwallad to al-Jāmidah; he does not mention al-Ḥawānīt.

385. Basil I, founder of the Macedonian dynasty, ruled from 867 to 886. He had his co-emperor, Michael III, murdered in his bed, enabling himself to become sole ruler of the Byzantine empire. See Ostrogorsky, History of the Byzantine State, 233ff.

386. See EI,[1] s.v "Ṣaḳāliba," a term meaning "Slav," widely applied to peoples of various origins who lived in territory lying between Constantinople and the lands of the Bulgars.

The Events of the Year 258

(NOVEMBER 18, 871–NOVEMBER 6, 872)

Among the important events of this year was the arrival of Sa'īd b. Aḥmad b. Sa'īd b. Salm al-Bāhilī before the central authorities, who ordered that he be punished with seven hundred lashes. This was in the month of Rabī' II (February 15–March 14, 872). Sa'īd died, and his body was placed on public display.[387]

In the same year also one of the religious judges of the Zanj leader, who had represented him in 'Abbādān, was beheaded. Fourteen other Zanj, who had been captured in the district of al-Baṣrah, were beheaded at the Public Gate in Sāmarrā.

Mufliḥ fought with some Arab tribesmen in Takrīt.[388] It was reported that they were sympathetic to Musāwir the Khārijite.

Masrūr al-Balkhī engaged in battle the Kurds of the Ya'qūbiyyah, routing them and inflicting casualties among them.

---

387. Sa'īd and the activities of the Bāhilah in the marshland areas have already been mentioned, p. 135, above. The capture and death of the Bāhilah chief, Sa'īd, caused the tribe to go over to the cause of the Zanj. See EI,[2] s.v. "Bāhila."

388. At this time Takrīt, located 30 miles north of Sāmarrā on the west bank of the Tigris, was regarded by the early Arab geographers as situated on the frontier between the province of Iraq and the Jazīrah but within the former. See Le Strange, Lands, 25, 57.

Muḥammad b. Wāṣil submitted obediently to the central authorities and delivered the taxes (kharāj) and the revenue of the estates in Fārs to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥusayn b. al-Fayyāḍ.

The Caliph al-Muʿtamid put his brother Abū Aḥmad in charge of the districts of Diyār Muḍar,[389] Qinnasrīn,[390] and al-ʿAwāṣim.[391] This occurred on Monday, the 20th of Rabīʿ I (February 4, 872). On [1860] Thursday, at the commencement of the new moon of Rabīʿ II (around February 29, 872), the Caliph in assembly bestowed robes of honor upon both his brother and Mufliḥ. The two of them set out for al-Baṣrah, riding in a public procession, with al-Muʿtamid accompanying Abū Aḥmad as far as Bazkuwār,[392] whence he returned to Sāmarrā.

Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar b. Dīnār al-Khayyāṭ was killed in the course of this year.[393]

An Account of [Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar's] Death

It was reported that, following the carnage wrought by his troops in al-Baṣrah, the abominable one ordered ʿAlī b. Abān al-Muhallabī to march toward Jubbā to wage war against Manṣūr b. Jaʿfar, who at the time was in Al-Ahwāz. ʿAlī camped opposite ʿAlī's army, which was then stationed in al-Khayzurāniyyah, Manṣūr employing at this moment small contingents of infantry. The abominable one then sent twelve barges to ʿAlī b. Abān, manned with the toughest of his troops, and placed in their charge Abū al-Layth al-Iṣbahānī.[394] He ordered Abū al-Layth to obey ʿAlī's commands, but this he failed to do to the extent of imposing his own views upon ʿAlī. As Manṣūr was approaching with his own barges to make one of his regular at-

389. Lying along the banks of the Euphrates, one of the three districts constituting the province of the Jazīrah; it was named after the tribe of Muḍar. See Le Strange, Lands, 86.

390. The ancient Chalcis in northern Syria.

391. See Le Strange, Lands, 101–2; EI,[2] s.v. "al-ʿAwāṣim." This was part of the frontier zone between Byzantium and the ʿAbbāsid domains in the north and northeast of Syria. Abū Aḥmad's responsibilities in these districts were nominal; his real task was to conduct the campaign against the Zanj, as the remainder of the paragraph makes clear.

392. A town on the Tigris near al-Qādisiyyah, variously referred to as Barkuwāra, Balkuwāra (see Le Strange, Lands, 52), or Barkuwān, as in manuscript C.

393. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 251–52.

394. Abū al-Layth appears to have been the chief, if not the only, commander, or "admiral," of the Zanj flotilla.

tacks on the enemy, Abū al-Layth suddenly set out to meet him without first having consulted 'Alī about this. Manṣūr seized Abū al-Layth's barges and killed a large number of both whites and Zanj who were aboard them. Abū al-Layth himself managed to escape and found his way back to the abominable one. 'Alī b. Abān turned back as well with all his forces and remained in camp for a whole month. Then with his infantry troops he set out again to fight Manṣūr. After establishing his new camp, he sent out scouts to gather information concerning Manṣūr and his soldiers.

[1861] Now Manṣūr had a prefect stationed at Karnabā.[395] 'Alī b. Abān launched a night attack against this commander, killing him along with most of those based there. 'Alī looted the camp, took some horses, and burned the place to the ground. He returned during the course of the same night, and arrived at the mouth of the Nahr Jubbā. News of this reached Manṣūr, who ventured forth, finally approaching ['Alī's base] in al-Khayzurāniyyah. 'Alī went out to challenge him with a small band of troops, and the battle between them lasted that day from mid-morning until noon. Manṣūr was forced to flee, and his own troops scattered, abandoning him. A party of Zanj caught up with Manṣūr and tracked him as far as the canal owned by 'Umar b. Mihrān. Manṣūr repeatedly turned to attack his pursuers until at last his spears were all broken and his supply of arrows depleted, leaving him completely defenseless. He then made his way to the edge of the canal, intending to cross over. He shouted encouragement to his horse and it leaped, but failed to reach the other bank, and he plunged into the water.

Shibl said that the reason why the horse was unable to make the crossing successfully was because one of the Zanj had seen Manṣūr head for the canal bank, intending to cross over. Hurriedly throwing himself into the water, he swam across ahead of Manṣūr. When Manṣūr's horse jumped, the black confronted it, causing the horse to shy away, tumbling both itself and its rider into the water. Manṣūr's head bobbed to the surface, and a slave from among the blacks of Muṣliḥ's lieutenants called Abrūn struck him a mortal blow and then commenced to rob him. A large number of those with Manṣūr were killed, including his brother Khalaf b. Ja'far. Yārjūkh then placed [a

395. The reading is uncertain.

Turk named] Aṣghajūn[396] in charge of Manṣūr's administrative duties.

On Tuesday, the 18th of Jumādā I (April 1, 872), Mufliḥ was killed by an untipped arrow, which struck him in the temple. He died the following morning; his body was borne to Sāmarrā, and he was buried there. [1862]

An Account of [Mufliḥ's] Death[397]

I have already recounted how Abū Aḥmad [al-Muwaffaq] b. al-Mutawakkil departed from Sāmarrā and headed for al-Baṣrah to do battle with the cursed one.[398] I myself witnessed[399] in Baghdad the army with which Abū Aḥmad and Mufliḥ had set out. This was after the news had reached Abū Aḥmad and al-Mu'tamid concerning the atrocities endured by Muslims in al-Baṣrah and adjacent territories. The army passed by the Bāb al-Ṭāq,[400] the quarter where I was then staying, and I happened to hear a group of the elders of Baghdad saying that they had seen many armies of the caliphs but none that appeared larger and better equipped or prepared than this one. A large enthusiastic crowd of Baghdad's citizenry accompanied the army on its way through the city.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan recounted that Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī was camped on the Nahr Ma'qil before Abū Aḥmad's arrival in the locality of the abominable one. Yaḥyā sought permission of the Zanj leader to march on to the Nahr al-'Abbās, but this was strongly rejected out of fear that the central authorities' forces would arrive while his own troops were scattered in various places. Yaḥyā persisted, however, until he secured permission, and he departed, followed by the greater part of the abominable one's forces.

---

396. Thus in manuscript B; C, however, gives such alternative readings as Aṣfahūr and Asfajūr.

397. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 252–53.

398. This is the fourth epithet (al-la'īn) Ṭabarī employs for the Zanj leader, the others being "abominable one," "traitor," and "enemy of God."

399. A rare personal comment by Ṭabarī on an event at which he himself was present.

400. This was the great arched gate at the eastern end of the Main Bridge in Baghdad, which opened directly onto the major market street of the eastern quarter of the city. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 178; Lassner, Topography, 173–76.

'Alī b. Abān was stationed in Jubbā with a large number of the Zanj. Al-Baṣrah had already been plundered by his troops and they were busy moving back and forth transporting the goods they had seized [1863] from it. And so, at that time there were not many troops available to man the abominable one's own camp. His situation remained thus when Abū Aḥmad arrived with Mufliḥ and his army, a formidable and mighty force such as had never before been sent against the abominable one.

When this war machine reached the Nahr Ma'qil, those of the Zanj leader's troops who were stationed there fled, terrified, to join him. The abominable one was alarmed by this development, and he summoned two of his army chiefs who had been present at the Nahr Ma'qil and asked them why they had abandoned their position. They told him of the might of the approaching army they had seen, its equipment, and its high state of preparedness. There was no way their own forces were sufficient to stop it. The abominable one inquired whether they knew the identity of the army commander. They did not; although efforts had been made to discover who he was, they had failed, owing to the lack of a trustworthy informant. So the abominable one despatched scouts in skiffs to attempt to glean this intelligence. His messengers returned with information concerning the imposing might of the army, but none had been able to find out who the commander-in-chief or the other leaders were. This lack of information only served to increase his apprehension and dismay. So [the Zanj leader] sent urgent word to 'Alī b. Abān informing him of the approaching danger and ordering him to bring to him such troops as he had available. The government's army arrived and established camp in front of the Zanj position. On the day of the battle, which was a Wednesday, the abominable one ventured forth on foot, making the rounds of his army to examine carefully the state of affairs on his own side, as well as those confronting him.

[1864] That day a light rain had fallen. The ground was wet, making it slippery underfoot. The Zanj leader had made an early morning reconnaissance and after his return he called for ink and paper to despatch a message to 'Alī b. Abān. He informed him of what he had observed of the government forces and ordered him to send whatever number of infantry he could spare.

While [the Zanj leader] was thus engaged, someone called Abū Dulaf, who was one of the commanders of the blacks, came to him and said, "The enemy has advanced and the Zanj have fled from them; they had no leader among them to check their flight until they reached the fourth ḥabl."[401] The Zanj leader berated him loudly, saying, "Get out of my sight, you liar! You don't know what you're talking about. You have only been alarmed by the numbers of troops you have seen."

Abū Dulaf left him, and the abominable one then turned to his secretary, who had ordered Ja'far b. Ibrāhīm al-Sajjān[402] to summon the Zanj to move into the battlefield. Al-Sajjān informed the Zanj leader that he had despatched them and that his troops had seized two skiffs. Al-Sajjān was next commanded to get the infantry ready. It was only a short while after this that Mufliḥ was struck by an arrow from a concealed archer. Thereafter defeat was unavoidable, as the Zanj overwhelmed their enemy and engulfed them in a bloodbath. The Zanj brought to the abominable one heads of the enemy, holding them by their teeth, and tossed them at his feet; that day the heads of the enemy filled every corner. The Zanj even began to apportion the flesh of their victims among themselves and to exchange it as gifts. A prisoner from Farāghinah was brought before the traitor, who asked him who the commander of the army was, and he told him of the whereabouts of Abū Aḥmad and Mufliḥ. The Zanj leader was alarmed at the mention of Abū Aḥmad's name. Whenever he became alarmed by something, he would deny its truth. He said, [1865]
"There is no leader in the army other than Mufliḥ, for I have heard mention of none save him. If the one this prisoner mentioned were in the army, he would be of such importance that Mufliḥ would only be his subordinate and adjutant to his associates."

When Abū Aḥmad's troops attacked the abominable one's camp, the noncombatants were filled with such fear that they fled from their dwellings and sought refuge by the Nahr Abī al-Khaṣīb. At this time there were no bridges spanning the water, and as a consequence

401. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CLXXIX, where the suggested meaning is one attested in Lane, Lexicon, as "'the station of the horses collected for a race before they are let go,' which was probably marked by an extended rope and was for that reason thus called." More likely, however, ḥabl means here a measure of distance, indicated by some marker. Le Strange, Baghdad, 326 n. 1, notes that al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī used the term ḥabl for a length equivalent to the side of a jarīb. See also Hinz, Islamische Masse, 62.

402. As his name suggests, he was a jailer.

a great number of women and children drowned in the attempt to cross it.

The abominable one had not long to wait after the battle before 'Alī b. Abān arrived with a number of his troops, although by then there was little need of them. Shortly after Mufliḥ's death, Abū Aḥmad withdrew to al-Ubullah to reassemble his shattered forces and renew his preparations for war. Finally, he set out for Nahr Abī al-Asad and set up his camp there.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported that the abominable one did not know how Mufliḥ had been killed.[403] But, when he heard that he had been hit by a stray arrow that no one claimed, he boasted that he had himself shot it. Muḥammad continued: "I heard him say that an arrow had fallen near him and his servant Wah[404] picked it up and brought it to him. He then shot it and killed Mufliḥ. I know that he lied about that, because I was present and witnessed the whole thing; he did not get off his horse until the battle was over and the news arrived of the enemy's defeat and the heads were brought."

In this year an epidemic struck the population of the Tigris districts, and many people died in Madīnat al-Salām, Sāmarrā, Wāsiṭ, and elsewhere.

In this year as well Khuraskhāris[405] was killed, along with a number of his troops in Byzantine territory.

[1866] Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī, the close associate of the Zanj leader, was captured in this year and killed.

An Account of [Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad's] Capture and Death[406]

Muḥammad b. Sim'ān the secretary reportedly said that when Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad reached the Nahr al-'Abbās he encountered at the mouth of the canal three hundred seventy horsemen from the forces of Aṣghajūn, who was in those days the financial administrator of al-Ahwāz; the horsemen were recruited from the same area. Upon seeing them, Yaḥyā underestimated their number and imagined 403. See Popovic, Révolte, 105 and n. 3.

404. Thus in Manuscript B; C is unpointed and could be read bah/nah, etc.
405. The reading is uncertain.
406. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 254.

that he had nothing to fear, given the size of his own force. So, without anything to protect them from danger, his troops attacked, and Aṣghajūn's soldiers rained arrows down upon them, injuring many. Yaḥyā then despatched one hundred twenty of his own horsemen across the canal, together with a large number of foot soldiers. Aṣghajūn's troops withdrew, allowing al-Baḥrānī's force to enter the canal. This was at a time of low water and the transport boats were stranded in the mud. The men on the boats saw the approaching Zanj and decided to abandon them, whereupon they were seized and an immense amount of valuable goods were plundered from them. The Zanj then headed for the marsh area known as the Baṭīḥah al-Ṣaḥnāh, carrying their spoils, but they left the well-traveled road, owing to the mutual envy that existed between al-Baḥrānī and ʿAlī b. Abān al-Muhallabī. Yaḥyā's companions advised him not to take the road frequented by ʿAlī's army. Yaḥyā accepted their advice, and [1867] they set out for and finally entered the marshland, showing him the road we have just mentioned. There Yaḥyā granted leave to the cavalry and ordered Abū al-Layth al-Iṣbahānī to march them to the encampment of the Zanj commander.

The abominable one had sent word to Yaḥyā alerting him of the approaching army that he had encountered and urging him to be on his guard on his return lest he also run into the enemy. Al-Baḥrānī sent out some scouting parties to the Tigris and they left just as Abī Aḥmad's army was setting off from al-Ubullah for the Nahr Abī al-Asad.

The reason for the departure of the government's forces to the Nahr Abū al-Asad was that Rāfiʿ b. Bisṭām and others from the neighborhood of Nahr al-ʿAbbās and the Baṭīḥah al-Ṣaḥnāh had communicated with Abū Aḥmad informing him of al-Baḥrānī and the size of his forces and, moreover, that he was planning to leave Nahr al-ʿAbbās for the Tigris. They thus advised Abū Aḥmad to advance to the Nahr Abū al-Asad and establish his army camp there in order to interrupt the flow of supplies to al-Baḥrānī and preventing anyone coming to or going from his camp. Yaḥyā's scouts returned with the news of Abū Aḥmad's army, causing him increasingly to fear an encounter. He therefore turned back along the road he had come from, both he and his troops experiencing great hardship. They succumbed to a sickness owing to their constant exposure in the swamp and many of their number fell ill. As they neared the Nahr al-'Abbās, Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad placed Sulaymān b. Jāmi' in charge of the vanguard of the Zanj who were engaged in towing their boats out of the Nahr al-'Abbās. The government forces, however, had barges and skiffs provided by Aṣghajūn guarding the mouth of the canal, along with contingents of cavalry and infantry. This situation caused considerable concern to Yaḥyā and his soldiers. The Zanj then abandoned their boats and took themselves off to the west [1868] of the Nahr al-'Abbās making for the al-Zaydān road and the encampment of the abominable one.

Yaḥyā was totally in the dark about what had happened to this group [of Zanj]. No news reached him in the central sector of his army, which had just reached the Qūraj al-'Abbās Bridge (qanṭarah), at a narrow spot where the water flowed very swiftly in the channel. From there he could oversee his Zanj troops as they towed their boats, some of which sank while others were rescued.

Muḥammad b. Sim'ān reported that while he was standing there by the bridge, Yaḥyā came up to him and was clearly astonished by the violent force of the water and the great difficulty experienced by his men in towing their boats. He said, "What do you imagine would happen if the enemy attacked us now; what situation could be worse the ours?" He was interrupted by the arrival of Ṭāshtimur al-Turkī with the army that Abū Aḥmad had despatched upon his return from al-Ubullah to the Nahr Abī al-Asad. Great consternation broke out among Yaḥyā's troops.

Muḥammad [b. Simān] continued: "I jumped up to take a look and saw red flags appear on the western side of the Nahr al-'Abbās were Yaḥyā was located. The Zanj spotted them and, throwing themselves into the canal, they crossed over to the eastern side. Yaḥyā's location became deserted, and only a few dozen men remained with him. At that Yaḥyā took up his shield and sword and wrapped a cloth around his waist. He met the approaching enemy with his small band and Ṭāshtimur's troops showered arrows upon them, swiftly causing many wounds. Al-Baḥrānī himself was wounded in three places, both his arms and his left leg. When his companions saw him injured, they scattered. However, as he was not recognized and no one made to finish him off, he retraced his way to one of the [1869] boats and crossed over [as well] to the eastern side of the canal. The time was about midmorning."

The wounds that Yaḥyā had sustained sapped his strength. His condition caused the Zanj's fear to increase and their resolve to weaken. They abandoned the battle, their only concern now being to save their own skins. The government troops plundered the boats situated on the western bank of the canal. When they had finished, they boarded one of the boats with fire-throwing machines and crossed over to the opposite bank where they proceeded to burn the craft the Zanj had abandoned there. The Zanj themselves had scattered, leaving Yaḥyā on his own. For the remainder of the day, those who could do so slipped away, leaving many dead and captured behind them, finally escaping under the protective cover of darkness. Seeing the total collapse of his forces, Yaḥyā boarded a galley that one of the white fighters was in charge of. He brought with him a practitioner of the medical arts called Abū Jaysh ʿAbbād, because of the injuries he was suffering from. His only desire was to make good his escape to the camp of the abominable one. As they approached the mouth of the canal, the sailors in the galley saw ahead of them barges and gallies [of the government forces] blockading the canal. They feared to approach too near, certain as they were to be apprehended. They then crossed over to the western bank and put Yaḥyā and those with him on shore at a small plantation. Yaḥyā made some distance on foot moving with difficulty until, too exhausted to go further, he dropped and spent the night where he was. The next morning the physician ʿAbbād, who was still with him, set out on foot carefully on the lookout for anyone. When he came across some of the government's troops, he signaled to them, told them where Yaḥyā was hiding, and then showed them the way, so that he fell into their hands. Some claim, however, that it had been another group of [1870] people who, in passing by Yaḥyā, saw him and gave his position away so that he was captured. The news of Yaḥyā's fate reached the abominable one, leader of the Zanj, which greatly increased his unease and heightened his sense of sorrow at the loss.

Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Azraq al-Baḥrānī was taken to Abū Aḥmad who transported him to al-Muʿtamid in Sāmarrā. A platform was ordered constructed at al-Ḥayr by the racecourse; Yaḥyā was then elevated before the crowd so they could witness him being publicly flogged. It is reported that he entered Sāmarrā on Wednesday, the 9th of Rajab [May 21, 872], seated upon a camel. Al-Muʿtamid held an assembly on the following morning, which was Thursday, and Yaḥyā was given two hundred strokes of a whip end in the Ca-liph's presence. Next his hands and legs were severed from opposite sides.[407] Then he was beaten severely with swords, drawn and quartered, and finally his body was burned.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan related that, when Yaḥyā al-Baḥrānī was executed and the news of this reached the leader of the Zanj, he said, "Yaḥyā's death was deeply distressing to me and my anxiety was intense, when a voice addressed me saying that his death was a blessing for me, as he was a greedy person." Sometime later he approached a group of people I was standing with and said that an example of Yaḥyā's cupidity was the following story: "Once we had acquired a great deal of booty from one of the towns we took, and there came into his possession two necklaces of which the larger and more precious he concealed from me, showing me only the less valuable one, requesting that I give it to him as a gift. This I did. But I was then informed of the one he had hidden, and, summoning him, I said, 'Give me the necklace that you have concealed.' However, he produced only the one I had already presented to him, denying that he had taken any other. But, when I began to describe the necklace that had been reported to me, watching him, he became pale and speechless. He left and later brought me the second necklace and beseeched me to give it to him as a gift also. I did so and ordered him [1871] to seek God's forgiveness for his deed."

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan — Muḥammad b. Sim'ān reported that one day the Zanj leader said to him that he had been offered prophethood but that he had refused. Ibn Sim'ān asked why and received the reply that prophethood involved burdens[408] he feared he had not the strength to bear.

In this same year Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil withdrew from his position in the neighborhood of the Zanj leader and made for Wāsiṭ.

An Account of [Abū Aḥmad's] Withdrawal to Wāsiṭ[409]

After Abū Aḥmad had gone to the Nahr Abū al-Asad and camped there, illness and disease spread among his soldiers and others ac-

407. A punishment prescribed in Qur'ān 5:33 (al-Mā'idah).

408. Popovic, Révolte, 107, reads this word as 'abā', "robe" (of prophethood), rather than a'bā'an, a plural in the accusative, as in the text; the emendation does not seem justified. See Halm, Traditionen, 215.

409. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 255–56.

companying him. A number died, but he could not move until those who survived had managed to recover. Abū Aḥmad then set out to return to Bādhāward,[410] where he camped. He ordered the renewal of the army's equipment and the distribution to the troops of their allotments. He also refurbished the barges, galleys, and ferries and placed them under the command of men from among his freedmen.[411]

Setting out in pursuit of the abominable one's army, Abū Aḥmad ordered a group of his commanders to make for certain spots that he listed, including the Nahr Abī al-Khaṣīb and other places. Other commanders he ordered to stay with him to fight at the spot he himself would select. When the battle resumed between the two sides, most of his forces moved toward the Nahr Abī al-Khaṣīb, while Abū Aḥmad remained with only a handful of his troops. He held his position for fear that the Zanj might be tempted to attack him and other groups of his forces exposed to them while they were in the salt flats of Nahr Mankā. The Zanj observed the dispersal of Abū [1872] Aḥmad's troops and found out his [precarious] position, so they concentrated on it. Battle flared up furiously with many dead and injured on both sides. Abū Aḥmad's troops burned many of the fortified places and dwellings of the Zanj and rescued a large number of female [captives]. The Zanj then directed all their efforts toward the place where Abū Aḥmad was stationed. [Abū Aḥmad] al-Muwaffaq appeared on a barge and plunged into the middle of the battle, urging on his troops, until there arrived a crowd of Zanj whom he knew he could not combat, given the small number of his own followers. Realizing that the better part of valor would be to disengage from battle, he commanded his own troops to retreat to their boats in deliberate and orderly fashion. Abū Aḥmad then reboarded his barge after ensuring that most of his men were safely aboard their boats. A detachment remained behind, and they sought refuge in the heavy thickets and narrow waterways. They were completely cut off from their comrades. The Zanj ambushed them and picked them off one by one. These men defended themselves and in the hand-to-hand combat many Zanj met their fate. Nevertheless, some one hundred ten heads of Abū Aḥmad's soldiers were sent to the leader of the Zanj, which only served to increase his arrogance.

---

410. Located between al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ. See Yaḥyā, Mu'jam, I, 462.

411. The phrase is min mawālihi wa-ghilmānihi.

Abū Aḥmad finally managed to make it back with his army to al-Bādhāward, where he stayed, mustering his troops for another round against the Zanj. A fire broke out at one end of the camp during a period of violent wind storms and the camp burned down. Then, in Shaʿbān of this year (June 12–July 10, 872), Abū Aḥmad made the return journey to Wāsiṭ and, after his arrival, the bulk of his troops dispersed.

On the 10th of Shaʿbān (June 21, 872) a dreadful, thunderous [1873] earthquake[412] occurred in al-Ṣaymarah.[413] Then the following morning, which was Sunday, an even greater crash than the first was heard, and as a result most of the city was destroyed. Everywhere walls of buildings collapsed, and, according to what was said, some twenty thousand persons were killed.

A man known as Abū Faqʿas was roundly beaten at the Public Gate in Sāmarrā, one thousand twenty strokes being administered. The charge against him was abusing the pious ancestors (salaf). He died on Thursday, the 7th of Ramaḍān (July 15, 872).

On Friday, the 8th of Ramaḍān (July 16, 872), Yārjūkh died. Abū ʿĪsā b. al-Mutawakkil recited the funerary prayers for him, with Jaʿfar b. al-Muʿtamid present.

In this year as well there occurred a battle between Mūsā b. Bughā and the troops of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, who were routed.

Masrūr al-Balkhī returned to Sāmarrā after his campaign against the Khārijite Musāwir. He brought back Khārijite prisoners and left Juʿlān behind as deputy of his army in al-Ḥadīthah.[414] Later Masrūr himself set out for the district of al-Bawāzīj,[415] where he encountered Musāwir again. In the ensuing battle a number of Musāwir's troops were captured. Before the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (October 8 to November 6, 872) Masrūr set out on the return journey.

---

412. The word is haddah, which Lane, Lexicon, s.v. h-d-d, states is a violent sound occasioned by a falling wall or part of a mountain; an earthquake certainly seems to have been the cause of the destruction.

413. The chief town in the district of Mihrajānqudhaq, on the frontier of Iraq. See Le Strange, Lands, 201–2.

414. This is Ḥadīthat al-Nūrah (Ḥadīthah of the Chalk Pit), which is on the Tigris and must be distinguished from the city al-Ḥadīthah on the Euphrates. See Le Strange, Lands, 64. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 257, calls the location Ḥadīthat al-Mawṣil, which would refer to the same place, that is, Ḥadīthah in the district of al-Mawṣil.

415. The town of Bawāzīj lay on the bank of the Lower Zab river, east of Sinn on the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 91.

In the same year a malady overcame people in Baghdad. It was called quffāʿ.[416]

In this year most of the Ḥājj pilgrims returned from al-Qarʿā'[417] out of a fear of thirst. But those who went on to Mecca arrived safely. The leader of the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq b. al-Ḥasan.[418]

---

416. A person described as aqfaʿ is one whose toes are misshapen. See A. de Biberstein Kazimirski, Dictionnaire arabe-français, s.v. q-f-ʿ.

417. Literally, "bare," so named, according to Yaḥyā, Muʿjam, IV, 325, because of its lack of vegetation. It was a stage on the route from al-Kūfah to Mecca.

418. This was the second year in succession that he had led the pilgrimage. See p. 135, above.

The Events of the Year

259[419]

(NOVEMBER 7, 872–OCTOBER 26, 873)

Among the events of this year was the return of Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil from Wāsiṭ to Sāmarrā. He arrived on Friday, the 26th of Rabīʿ I (January 30, 873). He appointed Muḥammad al-Muwallad to be responsible for Wāsiṭ and for pursuing the war against the abominable one in the area.[420]

The death of Kanjūr[421] occurred in this year.

An Account of [Kanjūr's] Death

At the time he was governor of al-Kūfah, Kanjūr left it without official sanction for Sāmarrā. He refused an order to return to al-Kūfah and so, according to what has been reported, money was transported

---

419. Popovic, Révolte, 109, notes the disproportionate amount of detail that Ṭabarī provides on the Zanj revolt. The years 255–58/868–72 cover more than twice the space given to the succeeding period, 259–65/873–79. In this latter period, Ṭabarī highlights only the important developments in the revolt.

420. See Popovic, Révolte, 108ff.

421. See n. 336, above.

to him to be distributed among his troops for their allotments. This failed to mollify Kanjūr, and he continued as far as 'Ukbarā'[422] in the month of Rabī' I (January 5–February 3, 873). In response, a number of army commanders were sent from Sāmarrā to deal with him, among them Sātikīn, Takīn, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ, Mūsā b. Utāmish, and others. They butchered him and sent his head to Sāmarrā. This was on the 29th of Rabī' I (February 2, 873). Some forty thousand dinars were seized from him at the same time. Kanjūr's Christian secretary was forced to surrender more money. Then in the following month, Rabī' II (February 4 to March 4, 873), this secretary was punished by being given one thousand lashes at the Public Gate [in Sāmarrā], from which he died.

In this year Sharkab al-Jammāl conquered Marv and its adjacent territories and plundered them.

Ya'qūb b. al-Layth returned from Balkh in this year and resided in Quhistān.[423] He appointed financial prefects over Herāt, Būshanj, and Bādhghīs, and then he departed for Sijistān.[424] [1875]

In this year as well 'Abdallāh al-Sijzī[425] abandoned Ya'qūb ibn al-Layth, breaking his bond of loyalty to him, and blockaded Naysābūr.[426] Then Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir sent messengers and legists to sort out matters, and they went back and forth between them [conducting negotiations], and finally 'Abdallāh was appointed governor of al-Ṭabasayn and Quhistān.[427]

---

422. A town lying on the east bank of the Tigris, about halfway between Baghdad and Sāmarrā. See Le Strange, Lands, 50, 51; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 33, 38–39.

423. The province of Quhistān was generally regarded by Arab geographers as a dependency of Khurāsān. See Le Strange, Lands, 352ff. The movements of Ya'qūb b. al-Layth mentioned in this paragraph reflect the expansion of his power in the eastern provinces of the 'Abbāsid domains. See Bosworth, "Ṭāhirids," 115ff.

424. The province situated on the southern border of Khurāsān; it was also called Sistān. Le Strange, Lands, 334–51, 431.

425. That is, a native of the province of Sijistān. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 261–62.

426. One of the four major cities of the province of Khurāsān, the others being Marv, Herāt, and Balkh. See Le Strange, Lands, 382–88.

427. There were two places in Quhistān called Ṭabas; Ṭabas al-Tamr and Ṭabas al-'Unnāb, which are often referred to in the dual form Ṭabasayn. This province of Quhistān, which means "mountain land," is not to be confused with the Persian equivalent of the district known in Arabic as al-Jibāl. See Le Strange, Lands, 186, 359.

On the 6th of Rajab (May 8, 873) of this year ('Alī b. Abān) al-Muhallabī and Yaḥyā b. Khalaf al-Nahrabaṭṭī overran Sūq al-Ahwāz and killed a great many inhabitants, including the chief of security.

An Account of [the] Battle [at Sūq al-Ahwāz] and How the Army Commander[428] of the Central Authorities Was Killed

The burning of Abū Aḥmad's military camp in al-Bādhāward was reported to have been kept from the leader of the Zanj. He discovered what had happened only three days later, when two men from 'Abbādān visited him and gave him the news.

At this the Zanj leader returned to plundering, as supplies of food were cut off from him. He sent off 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī with most of the army accompanied by Sulaymān b. Jāmi', who had taken charge of the forces formerly under Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Baḥrānī and Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Sha'rānī. Sulaymān was also placed in charge of the cavalry while the rest of the troops were with 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī.

At the time the governor of al-Ahwāz was someone called Aṣghajūn; stationed there with him were Nayzak and a number of other [1876] commanders. 'Alī b. Abān approached al-Ahwāz with his Zanj forces, and when Aṣghajūn was alerted to this he advanced toward 'Alī with his own troops, the two sides meeting in the desert wastes of Dastimārān. That day fate was against Aṣghajūn, who was drowned, while Nayzak and many of his troops were slain. Al-Ḥasan b. Harthamah al-Shār and al-Ḥasan b. Ja'far Zāwashār were both taken prisoner the same day.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan — al-Ḥasan b. (al-Harthamah) al-Shār said, "That day we left al-Ahwāz with Aṣghajūn to meet the Zanj, but our troops were unable to stand their ground, and they fled; Nayzak was killed, and Aṣghajūn went missing. When I became aware of this, I dismounted from my own crop-tailed horse.[429] By leading another horse I had with me into the river and seizing hold of its tail, I planned to make good my escape. But my servant beat me to it, making his escape and leaving me behind. I then tried to join Mūsā 428. Ṣāḥib al-ḥarb.

429. Faras mahdhūf. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. h-dh-f.

b. Ja'far so the two us could get away together, but he had boarded a rivercraft and departed without waiting for me. I caught sight of another boat, which I managed to board, but a crowd gathered round demanding to be taken on board as well, and, with so many clinging to the craft, they caused it to capsize. I scrambled onto the overturned hull and the crowd departed just as the Zanj arrived. They began shooting arrows at me and, as I felt my end was near, I cried out to them, 'Stop shooting and toss me something that I can grab myself and reach you.' So they extended a spear, which I grabbed with my hand, and they pulled me out. As for al-Ḥasan b. Ja'far, his brother put him on a horse and set him up to act as a messenger between him and the commander of the army. But, in the wake of [1877] defeat and in his haste to find safety, his horse stumbled, and he was captured."

'Alī b. Abān relayed the news of the battle to the abominable one and sent him many enemy heads and banners as well. Al-Ḥasan b. al-Shār, al-Ḥasan b. Ja'far, and Aḥmad b. Rūḥ, along with other captives, were ordered imprisoned. Meanwhile 'Alī b. Abān entered al-Ahwāz and systematically pillaged it, forcing the central authorities to assign Mūsā b. Bughā to the task of waging war against the abominable one.

Mūsā b. Bughā left Sāmarrā for this purpose on the 17th of Dhū al-Qa'dah (September 14, 873). Al-Mu'tamid accompanied him in public procession as far as the city walls and there bestowed robes of honor upon him.

This same year 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ arrived in al-Ahwāz, Isḥāq b. Kundāj[430] in al-Baṣrah, and Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā in Bādhāward, all acting on authority of Mūsā b. Bughā in preparation for waging war aginst the Zanj leader.

An Account of How [Mūsā b. Bughā's Commanders] Fared against the Zanj[431]

Following Ibn Mufliḥ's arrival in al-Ahwāz, he reportedly encamped for ten days at the Arbuk Bridge and then set out against ['Alī b. Abān] al-Muhallabī. Ibn Mufliḥ was defeated in the encounter by al-

430. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 260, calls him Isḥāq b. Kandajīq.
431. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 259–60.

Muhallabī and forced to withdraw to regroup his forces. Ibn Mufliḥ returned to do battle again. In the violent fighting the Zanj were dealt a devastating blow in numbers killed and taken captive. 'Alī b. Abān was routed, yet managed to escape with some followers to Bayān. The abominable one tried to induce them to return to battle but, owing to the fear that gripped their hearts, they could not. When he saw the situation as it was, he allowed them to enter his camp; [1878] they did so and settled for a time in his city.

'Abd al-Raḥmān (b. Mufliḥ) arrived in Ḥiṣn al-Mahdī[432] to establish his army there. The abominable one sent 'Alī b. Abān to fight him but, as 'Alī was unable to overcome Ibn Mufliḥ, he headed for a place called al-Dakar. At this time Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā was in al-Bādhāward, and in one engagement he defeated 'Alī, who, when he returned to the attack, was beaten again. During the night 'Alī left and, accompanied by some guides who led him through the dense thickets and copses, he reached Nahr Yaḥyā. 'Abd al-Raḥmān received news of 'Alī's [movements] and despatched Ṭāshtimur against him with a contingent of mawlās. However, owing to the inaccessibility of 'Alī's position and the impenetrable barrier of reeds and grasses, Ṭāshtimur failed to reach him. So he forced them out by setting fire to the vegetation. A number of Zanj were captured, and Ṭāshtimur brought them and [news of] the victory to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ while 'Alī b. Abān made his way to Nasūkhā[433] and set up camp there with the remainder of his forces. News of 'Alī's move reached 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ, and he immediately shifted his own camp to al-'Amūd.

Meanwhile, 'Alī b. Abān had gone toward Nahr al-Sidrah,[434] where he wrote to the abominable one seeking his reinforcements and barges. Thirteen barges were sent containing several contingents of Zanj troops. With these 'Alī set out to meet 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ, who had also made his way toward an encounter. However, no fighting occurred and the two armies stood arrayed against each other for the whole day. After nightfall, 'Alī hand-[1879] picked a number of his troops, in whose courage and fortitude he had

---

432. A fortress situated at the head of the estuary of the Dujayl. See Le Strange, Lands, 238, 243; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 313.

433. The reading is conjectural.

434. The broad reach of the Dujayl below al-Ahwāz was known as Nahr al-Sidrah, the Lotus canal. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 258.

complete trust. Leaving the rest of his army behind in order to conceal his real intentions, ʿAlī set out with these select few accompanied by Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Shaʿrānī. Taking up a position in the rear of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, ʿAlī launched a surprise night attack on the camp and inflicted serious losses on him and his troops, forcing ʿAbd al-Raḥmān to retreat and abandon four of his own fleet of barges; ʿAlī recovered these and departed. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān proceeded as far as al-Dūlāb,[435] where he reestablished his camp. Placing Ṭāshtimur in command of some of his infantry troops, he sent them into another campaign against ʿAlī b. Abān. Ṭāshtimur and ʿAlī met each other in the environs of Bayān Āzar.[436] In the fighting ʿAlī was forced to flee to Nahr al-Sidrah. When Ṭāshtimur sent word of ʿAlī's defeat to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, he set out with his army to reach al-ʿAmūd, where he set up camp and prepared his troops for battle. The barges, over which Ṭāshtimur was given command, were put in order and with them he ventured forth to the mouth of Nahr al-Sidrah, where he engaged ʿAlī b. Abān in a major battle. ʿAlī was again routed, losing ten of his barges and being forced to return in defeat to the abominable one. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān immediately set up his army camp in Bayān, from which both he and Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā advanced and attacked by turns the abominable one's position, stirring great fear among those in his camp.

Isḥāq b. Kundāj, who at the time was stationed in al-Baṣrah, had cut off the flow of supplies to the army of the abominable one. On the day that he feared that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā would come out against him, the abominable one would gather together his forces until the battle was over and then send a detachment of them to the outskirts of al-Baṣrah, where Isḥāq b. Kundāj would attack them. For over ten months they remained deadlocked in this fashion, until Mūsā b. Bughā was replaced by Masrūr al-Balkhī as the one in charge of conducting the campaign against the abominable one. News of this change reached the abominable one. [1880]

In this same year al-Ḥasan b. Zayd conquered Qūmis,[437] and his troops occupied the city.

---

435. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 622, where it is written as al-Dawlab.

436. Emended from the text: Bayāb Āzar. The critical apparatus suggests Bayān is a possible reading in Manuscript B, which is supported also in C. The reading Bayān would also seem to be supported by its mention a few lines later, though in both B and C it is unpointed.

437. This small province stretched along the foot of the chain of the Alburz moun-

In this year as well a battle occurred between Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl b. Sinān al-Qazwīnī and Wahsūdhān b. Justān al-Daylamī,[438] who was routed by Muḥammad.

Mūsā b. Bughā appointed al-Ṣalābī[439] this year as governor of al-Rayy, at the time when Kayghalagh attacked Takīn[440] and killed him. Al-Ṣalābī went to take up his post.

The Byzantine emperor[441] conquered Sumaysāṭ[442] in this year and also attacked Malaṭyah[443] and besieged its inhabitants, who fought back and succeeded in driving him off. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Qābūs killed Naṣr al-Iqrīṭashī, the supreme commander.[444]

This year, too, a group of Zanj prisoners was sent to Sāmarrā from al-Ahwāz. The Sāmarrān mob attacked and killed many of them and stripped their bodies.

Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth entered Naysābūr this year.

[1881] An Account of [Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth's Entry into Naysābūr][445]

Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth had reportedly gone to Herāt and then headed for Naysābūr. As he approached the city, intending to enter it, Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir sent word to him requesting that Yaʿqūb receive him, but he refused to comply. So Muḥammad had some of his kinsmen intercede on his behalf with Yaʿqūb, after which, in the evening of the 4th of Shawwāl (August 3, 873), Yaʿqūb entered the city and encamped in one of the suburbs called Dāʾūdābādh. Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir rode out to meet Yaʿqūb in his pavilion, where he was closely tains. The capital town was al-Damghān, which the Arabs often called (Madīnat) Qūmis. See Le Strange, Lands, 364–65.

---

438. One of the chiefs of the Daylamites who, in 250/864, had sworn allegiance to the ʿAlid al-Ḥasan b. Zayd in a collaborative campaign against the Ṭāhirid Sulaymān b. ʿAbdallāh. See Ṭabarī, III, 1527–28.

439. Unidentified.

440. The reading is uncertain, and therefore it is not clear that this is the same person as the army commander mentioned on p. 151, above, who was despatched with others to deal with Kanjūr. There is no evidence that the latter Takīn held the governorship of al-Rayy, which is what the context suggests.

441. See n. 385, above.

442. A town on the Euphrates in the district of Diyār Muḍar, which bordered on the province of the Jazīrah. Le Strange, Lands, 87.

443. Called by the Greeks Melitene; it was an important fortress on the frontier between Muslim and Byzantine territory. See Le Strange, Lands, 120.

444. Biṭrīq al-Baṭāriqah, commander of ten thousand men.

445. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 261–62.

questioned. Ya'qūb then began to upbraid and rebuke Muḥammad for neglecting his duties, after which he appointed 'Uzayz b. al-Sarī as his agent and replaced Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir with him as governor of Naysābūr. Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir and his kinsmen were imprisoned, and, when news of this reached the central authorities, they despatched Ḥātim b. Zayrak b. Salām to Ya'qūb at once. One the 20th of Dhū al-Qa'dah (September 17, 873) the central authorities received Ya'qūb's communications. According to report, Ja'far b. al-Mu'tamid and Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil held an audience in the main hall of the Jawsaq palace, attended by the army commanders. Permission was granted Ya'qūb's messengers to address them, and they related details that had come to Ya'qūb's attention concerning the state of affairs among the population of Khurāsān, where Khārijites and brigands had overrun the place, gravely weakening Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir's position. This had caused people to correspond with Ya'qūb, imploring him to come to their assistance, to which request he responded. When Ya'qūb was still ten farsakhs[446] from Naysābūr, people from the city met him and surrendered it, allowing him to enter.

Abū Aḥmad (b. al-Mutawakkil) and 'Ubaydallāh b. Yaḥyā then spoke to the messengers, saying that the Commander of the Faithful could not condone what Ya'qūb had done. He was therefore ordering Ya'qūb to return to the duties in his own province. As he had no justification for doing what he had done without orders, he must return [to his province]. If he returned, he would be behaving as a governor should; if not, then he would be treated as a rebel. Ya'qūb's messengers were sent back. [Before they left] they were each presented with a three-piece robe of honor.[447] They had brought with them a head stuck upon a lance with a message on it, which read: "This is the head of God's enemy 'Abd al-Raḥmān the Khārijite, who for thirty years falsely professed himself caliph in Herāt. He was slain by Ya'qūb b. al-Layth." [1882]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, who was known as Burayh.[448]

---

446. About 60 km.

447. Khil'ah fīha thalāthah athwāb. See n. 257, above.

448. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 272, identifies him as governor (al-'āmil) and amīr of Mecca.

The Events of the Year 260

(OCTOBER 27, 873–OCTOBER 15, 874)

Among the events taking place this year was the death of Muḥammad b. Hārūn b. al-Muʿammar,[449] who was slain by one of the Kurds of Musāwir the Khārijite. Discovered aboard a boat heading for Sāmarrā, Muḥammad was killed, and his severed head sent to Musāwir. In Jumādā II (March 24, 874 – April 21, 874) [the tribe of] Rabīʿah sought to avenge Muḥammad's death, and so Masrūr al-Balkhī and a number of the other commanders were ordered to go after Musāwir.

[1883] In this year as well the leader of the Zanj killed ʿAlī b. Zayd al-ʿAlawī,[450] the master of al-Kūfah.

Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth in this same year fought and routed al-Ḥasan b. Zayd al-Ṭālibī and then entered Ṭabaristān.

An Account of [the] Battle [in Ṭabaristān][451]

Well-informed sources related to me that in the struggle for dominance of Sijistān between Yaʿqūb and ʿAbdallāh al-Sijzī, Yaʿqūb got the upper hand, while ʿAbdallāh managed to escape from him and join Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir in Naysābūr. When Yaʿqūb reached Naysābūr, ʿAbdallāh fled and joined up with al-Ḥasan b. Zayd,[452] following which Yaʿqūb set out in pursuit of him, after what went on between him and Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir, as I have already mentioned before.

449. Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, VII, 273, calls him Ibn al-Maʿmar.

450. His full name was ʿAlī b. Zayd b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿĪsā b. Zayd b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. See Popovic, Révolte, 110, for details.

451. See Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, VII, 268–69.

On his way into Ṭabaristān he passed Asfarā'īm[453] and its territories. A man lived there whom I used to know, called Badīl al-Kashshī. He was a collector of prophetic traditions and [was known for] practicing supererogatory works and commanding the good. He had been well received by the common people of this district. When Yaʿqūb stayed there he sent word to Badīl, informing him that they were alike in their performance of supererogatory works. Yaʿqūb continued to treat him with courtesy until Badīl ventured to come to visit him. Once in his power, however, Yaʿqūb placed Badīl in fetters and took him along to Ṭabarīstān, where, as he approached Sāriyah,[454] he was met by al-Ḥasan b. Zayd.

I was also told that Yaʿqūb sent word to al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, requesting that he deliver ʿAbdallāh al-Sijzī to him, after which he would depart, as he had come to Ṭabaristān only for the sake of ʿAbdallāh, not to pick a fight with al-Ḥasan. However, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd refused [1884] to hand over ʿAbdallāh. Yaʿqūb then informed al-Ḥasan of his intention to attack. The two armies met with neither side at first gaining the upper hand, though al-Ḥasan was finally forced to flee and head for al-Shirriz[455] and the country of Daylam. Yaʿqūb occupied Sāriyah and then proceeded toward Āmul,[456] collecting from its inhabitants a year's taxes. From Āmul he left for al-Shirriz in pursuit of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd. Upon reaching the mountains of Ṭabaristān, he encountered a period of uninterrupted rainfall which, according to my reports, lasted for some forty days. Only with extreme difficulty was he able to advance. As I was told, he had managed to ascend a moun-

452. Ṭabarī reported his last whereabouts in Qūmis, which he captured in 259. See p. 155, above. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 268, reports that at this time he was in Ṭabaristān, where ʿAbdallāh joined him.

453. Also written as Asfarayn, for which, see Le Strange, Lands, 393. It was a prosperous city in Khurāsān, located in a large plain of the same name.

454. At this time Sāriyah, rather than Āmul, was the seat of the Ṭāhirid governor in Ṭabaristān. See Le Strange, Lands, 370.

455. The reading is uncertain.

456. Le Strange, Lands, 370, 381.

tain, but the descent was possible only by his being borne upon the shoulders of his men, as most of the pack animals had perished. Thereafter he resumed his pursuit of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd to al-Shirriz.

Someone from that district informed me that Ya'qūb finally reached the road he had sought to join and there he paused with his troops. He advanced in front of them, carefully inspecting the way before finally rejoining his troops and ordering them to turn back. He said to his men, "If there is no other road than this, then there is no way of overtaking al-Ḥasan b. Zayd." The same person who had mentioned this to me also informed me that the women of this district said to their men, "Let him come, for, if Ya'qūb ventures upon this road, we will take care of him for you. We will be responsible for seizing and imprisoning him for you."

When Ya'qūb returned from the border area of Ṭabaristān, he reviewed his troops and discovered, as I was told, that he had lost forty thousand men along with the greater part of his horses, camels, and baggage, which were also lost.

It is said that he wrote to the central authorities about his expedition against al-Ḥasan b. Zayd and of his departure from Jurjān to [1885] Ṭamīs,[457] which he conquered. He then noted his passage to Sāriyah where al-Ḥasan b. Zayd had destroyed the bridges and removed the ferries, thus preventing any advance along that road. Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd was camped before the gate of Sāriyah, naturally protected by the surrounding great river valleys. Khurshād b. Jīlaw, the chief of Daylam, had come to al-Ḥasan's aid, providing a powerful force composed of troops gathered from Ṭabaristān, Daylam, Khurāsān, Qumm, al-Jabal, al-Shām, and al-Jazīrah. Ya'qūb said, "I routed al-Ḥasan and slew a greater number of the enemy than I've ever seen before, capturing as well seventy of the Ṭālibiyyīn." That took place in Rajab (April 22–May 21, 874). Al-Ḥasan b. Zayd returned to al-Shirriz, taking the Daylamites with him.

In this year in many of the Islamic lands prices shot up. According to one report, those who were living in Mecca for religous reasons abandoned it for Medina and other places because price rises were particularly severe [in Mecca]. The financial administrator, [Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad] Burayh, who had been living in Mecca, also left the city. In Baghdad, too, prices rose, a kurr[458] of barley reaching one hundred twenty dinars, while wheat[459] reached one hundred fifty dinars a kurr. The situation remained this way for several months.[460]

457. Le Strange, Lands, 375, notes that Ṭamīs (or Ṭamīsah) lay on the eastern frontier of Ṭabaristān, three marches distant from Sāriyah; it stood "on the great causeway across the marches which had been built to carry the high road by King Anūshirwan the Just." See also Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 503–4. This description helps clarify Ḥasan b. Zayd's moves to prevent passage along the road.

Arab tribesmen this year killed Manjūr the governor of Ḥimṣ. Baktimur [b. Tashtimur] was made governor in his place.

Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth left Ṭabaristān this year for the district of al-Rayy. According to a report I received, the reason for this was the fact that, after Yaʿqūb's defeat of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, ʿAbdallāh al-Sijzī had sought protection from Yaʿqūb with al-Ṣalābī, offering him the choice of either delivering ʿAbdallāh al-Sijzī to him, enabling him to return and leave al-Ṣalābī's jurisdiction, or else engaging in battle. According to what I was told, al-Ṣalābī chose to hand over ʿAbdallāh. [1886] This done, Yaʿqūb killed ʿAbdallāh and then departed al-Ṣalābī's territory.

In this year al-ʿAlāʾ b. Aḥmad al-Azdī was slain.

An Account of [al-Azdī's] Death

It was reported that al-ʿAlāʾ b. Aḥmad suffered a stroke and became gravely incapacitated as a result. The central authorities sent to Abū al-Rudaynī ʿUmar b. ʿAlī b. Murr, confirming him in the governorship of Adharbayjān, a position held by al-ʿAlāʾ b. Aḥmad. Abū al-Rudaynī set out to take possession of the province from al-ʿAlāʾ. In Ramaḍān [June 20–July 19, 874] al-ʿAlāʾ, borne upon a litter, went forth to confront in battle Abū al-Rudaynī, who was accompanined by a crowd of Khārijites and others. Al-ʿAlāʾ was killed. It is also reported that al-Rudaynī sent a number of his men to seize al-ʿAlāʾ's possessions, which he had left behind; goods valued at two million 458. A measure of wheat, etc., consisting of six assloads. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. k-r-r. See also Hinz, Islamische Masse, 64.

459. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 272, mentions only the price of wheat, which rose to one hundred twenty dinars.

460. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 273, adds in a separate note that price increases were also severe in Ifrīqiyah, the Maghrib, al-Andalus, and other places, which resulted in many deaths from epidemics and plague.

seven hundred thousand dirhams were removed from his fortress.

In this year the Byzantines captured Lu'lu'ah[461] from the Muslims.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl b. Ja'far b. Sulaymān b. 'Alī, known as Burayh.

---

461. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 371, who identifies Lu'lu'ah as a fortress near Tarsus. At this time it seemed to change hands regularly; Ṭabarī notes at the end of the year 263 (877) that the fortress was (again?) surrendered by the Muslims to their enemies.

The Events of the Year 261

(October 16, 874–October 5, 875)

Among the events occurring this year was the departure of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd from the land of Daylam for Ṭabaristān. He destroyed Shālūs[462] by fire [in revenge] for the assistance its people had given to Yaʿqūb. He also converted their estates into fiefs for the Daylamites.

Also this year the central authorities ordered ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir to round up the pilgrims present in Baghdad from Khurāsān, al-Rayy, Ṭabaristān, and Jurjān. This he did in Ṣafar [November 15 – December 13, 874] and read to them a declaration in which they were informed by the central authorities that Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth had not been commissioned as governor of Khurāsān. They were, furthermore, ordered to disavow him, because the Caliph disapproved his entry into Khurāsān and his capture of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir. [1887]

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Wāthiq died this year in the army camp of Yaʿqūb al-Ṣaffār.

462. A city two days march west of Āmul, with a large stone castle and adjoining congregational mosque. See Le Strange, Lands, 373.

In this year as well, during the month of Jumādā II (February 11 – March 12, 875), Musāwir the Khārijite killed Yaḥyā b. Ḥafṣ, who administered the Khurāsān Road, in Karkh Juddān.[463] Masrūr al-Balkhī went out in pursuit of Musāwir, and he was followed by Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil. Musāwir withdrew and was not overtaken by his pursuers.

In Jumādā I (February 1 – March 1, 876) of this year Abū Hāshim Dā'ūd b. Sulaymān al-Ja'farī was slain.

A battle took place in Rāmhurmuz this year between Muḥammad b. Wāṣil and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ, who was with Ṭāshtimur. Ibn Wāṣil killed Ṭāshtimur and captured Ibn Mufliḥ.

An Account of [the] Battle [of Rāmhurmuz][464]

According to reports I have received, the cause was because Ibn Wāṣil had killed al-Ḥārith b. Sīmā, the agent of the central government in Fārs, which had now fallen to Ibn Wāṣil. Fārs, along with al-Ahwāz, al-Baṣrah, al-Baḥrayn, and al-Yamāmah, was now assigned [1888] to Mūsā b. Bughā, in addition to the east, which he already controlled. Mūsā b. Bughā despatched 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ to al-Ahwāz to govern it and Fārs, giving him the assistance of Ṭāshtimur. Ibn Wāṣil got word of Mūsā's decision and also that Ibn Mufliḥ was headed for Fārs in pursuit of him, having previously been stationed in al-Ahwāz, where he had conducted a campaign against the Khārijite in al-Baṣrah.

Ibn Wāṣil marched toward Ibn Mufliḥ, and the two sides met in Rāmhurmuz, where Abū Dā'ūd al-Ṣa'lūk[465] joined forces with Ibn Wāṣil as support against Ibn Mufliḥ. In his triumph Ibn Wāṣil captured Ibn Mufliḥ, while destroying his army and slaying Ṭāshtimur. Ibn Mufliḥ remained captive until he was killed, although the central authorities had sent to Ibn Wāṣil Ismā'īl b. Isḥāq [the judge][466] to negotiate his release, but without securing any response from Ibn Wāṣil. Once Ibn Wāṣil was rid of Ibn Mufliḥ, he openly declared his intention of making for Wāsiṭ to fight Mūsā b. Bughā. He progressed 463. Located close to the border between Iraq and Iran. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 449.

464. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 275.
465. See n. 48, above.
466. He had been a member of the delegation sent by al-Mu'tamid to Ya'qūb b. al-Layth in Fārs. See p. 119, above.

as far as al-Ahwāz, where Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā was stationed with a large force. Mūsā b. Bughā, realizing the seriousness of matters, with the rising wave of rebels in the eastern districts and with resources insufficient to check them, requested to be relieved of his duties over these provinces. This was granted, and his territories were added to those of Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil, who was made governor over them all. Mūsā b. Bughā meanwhile retired from Wāsiṭ to the central authorities [in Sāmarrā], along with his administrative prefects from the eastern districts.

In this year Abū al-Sāj[467] was made governor of al-Ahwāz and given responsibility for the conduct of the campaign against the Zanj leader. Abū al-Sāj made for al-Ahwāz after ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mufliḥ had left for Fārs.

In this year as well a battle occurred between ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [who was related by marriage to Abū al-Sāj] and ʿAlī b. Abān in the [1889] district of al-Dūlāb. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was slain, and Abū al-Sāj departed for ʿAskar Mukram. The Zanj occupied al-Ahwāz and put some of its inhabitants to the sword, taking others captive and plundering and burning the houses. Thereafter Abū al-Sāj was removed from his duties in al-Ahwāz and his responsibilities for fighting the Zanj, being replaced as governor by Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā. He remained in charge, leaving al-Ahwāz only at the time when Mūsā b. Bughā was relieved of control of the eastern districts.

During this year Muḥammad b. Aws al-Balkhī was made governor of the Khurāsān Road.

When Abū Aḥmad took over control of the eastern provinces he appointed Masrūr al-Balkhī governor of al-Ahwāz, al-Baṣrah, the Tigris districts, al-Yamāmah, and al-Baḥrayn in Shaʿbān (May 11 – June 8, 875) of this year. He was also given the task of campaigning against the leader of the Zanj.

In Ramaḍān (June 9 – July 8, 875) Naṣr b. Aḥmad b. Asad al-Sāmānī[468] was appointed governor of the land beyond the river of Balkh[469]; he received a letter of appointment to this post.

---

467. His full name was Abū al-Sāj Diwdad b. Diwdast. He had previously held a post in al-Kūfah, with responsibility for repairing the Meccan road in 252 (866–67). See Ṭabarī, III, 1682–85; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 276; EI[1] s.v. "Sādjites."

468. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 279–82, provides more details on these developments; see also R. N. Frye, "The Sāmānids."

469. This was the territory known as Mā warāʾ al-nahr, "what was beyond the

In Shawwāl (July 9 – August 6, 875) Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth marched toward Fārs. Ibn Wāṣil was still encamped in al-Ahwāz, and from there he set out for Fārs; in Dhū al-Qaʿdah (August 7 – September 5, 875) he clashed with Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth, who routed him and destroyed his army. Yaʿqūb sent off men to Khurramah to strip clean Ibn Wāṣil's fortress,[470] the contents of which reportedly reached a value of forty million dirhams. He also took prisoner Mirdās, Ibn Wāṣil's maternal uncle.

[1890] During the year the troops of Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth assaulted the inhabitants of Zamm[471] Mūsā b. Mihrān al-Kurdī for the assistance they had rendered to Muḥammad b. Wāṣil. The troops killed them, forcing Mūsā b. Mihrān to flee.

On the 12th of Shawwāl (July 20, 875) of this year al-Muʿtamid held an assembly in the Public Audience Hall (dār al-ʿāmmah), at which he appointed his son Jaʿfar his heir, giving him the honorific title al-Mufawwaḍ ilā-Allāh. He also made him governor of the western regions, attaching Mūsā b. Bughā to him as governor of Ifrīqiyah, Egypt, Syria, al-Jazīrah, Mosul, Armenia, the Khurāsān Road, Mihrajānqadhaq, and Ḥulwān. Al-Muʿtamid also appointed his brother Abū Aḥmad[472] heir after Jaʿfar, making him governor of the eastern regions. Masrūr al-Balkhī was attached to him as governor of Baghdad, the Sawād, al-Kūfah, the Mecca Road, Medina, the Yemen, Kaskar, the Tigris districts, al-Ahwāz, Fārs, Iṣfahān, Qumm, al-Karaj, al-Dīnawar, al-Rayy, Zanjān, Qazwīn, Khurāsān, Ṭabaristān, Jurjān, Kirmān, Sijistān, and Sind. Al-Muʿtamid also bestowed upon each of his heirs two standards, one black, the other white. He stipulated that, in the event of his death, if Jaʿfar could not fulfill the duties of the caliphate,[473] it would pass first to Abū Aḥmad and then to Jaʿfar. On these terms the oath of allegiance was rendered by the people, and copies of the succession decree were dis-river," the river understood as the Oxus, the frontier between the Persian-speaking region of Khurāsān and Turkish Transoxania. See Le Strange, Lands, 433ff.

470. See Le Strange, Lands, 278. This was located some 80 km. from Shīrāz, on the road to Kirmān; see also Iṣṭakhrī, Kitāb al-masālik wa-al-mamālik, 102.

471. Known also as Zamm al-Bazanjān. See Ṭabarī, Index; also Iṣṭakhrī, Masālik, 145.

472. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 278, notes that at this ceremony Abū Aḥmad received his honorific title, al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh al-Muwaffaq.

473. That is, because Jaʿfar would not have reached the age of maturity, when he could assume these responsibilities.

seminated. One such copy was despatched with al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Shawārib to affix to the Kaʿbah [in Mecca]. In Shawwāl [July 9 – August 6, 875] Jaʿfar al-Mufawwaḍ made Mūsā b. Bughā his deputy over the western regions and sent Muḥammad al-Muwallad to him with an agreement to this effect.

Muḥammad b. Zaydawayh deserted Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth this year, [1891] withdrawing thousands of his troops from Yaʿqūb's army and going over to Abū al-Sāj, who welcomed him. Muḥammad stayed with him in al-Ahwāz and received a robe of honor from Sāmarrā. Ibn Zaydawayh then requested of the central authorities that al-Ḥusayn b. Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh be sent with him to Khurāsān.

On the 7th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah [September 12, 875] Masrūr al-Balkhī set out from Sāmarrā as Abū Aḥmad's vanguard. According to report, robes of honor were bestowed upon him and thirty-four of his commanders. The two heirs publicly escorted him, and al-Muwaffaq followed him from Sāmarrā on the 21st of Dhū al-Ḥijjah [September 26, 875].

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq b. al-Ḥasan b. Ismāʿīl b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbbās.

Al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Shawārib died this year after he had performed the pilgrimage.

The Events of the Year 262

(October 6, 875–September 23, 876)

Among the events taking place this year were the arrival of Ya'qūb b. al-Layth in Rāmhurmuz in the month of al-Muḥarram (October 6–November 4, 875) and the despatch of Ismā'īl b. Isḥāq and Bughrāj to him by the central authorities.[474] The central authorities also released from prison Ya'qūb b. al-Layth's supporters. At the time of the dispute between Ya'qūb and Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir, the authorities had imprisoned Ya'qūb's servant Waṣīf and other supporters who had stood by him. They were released from prison following Ya'- [1892] qūb's arrival in Rāmhurmuz on the 5th of Rabī' I (November 9, 875).

Thereafter Ismā'īl b. Isḥāq left Ya'qūb for Sāmarrā bearing a message from him. Meanwhile, Abū Aḥmad (al-Muwaffaq) held an audience in Baghdad, to which he summoned a group of merchants, informing them that the Commander of the Faithful had appointed Ya'qūb b. al-Layth governor of Khurāsān, Ṭabaristān, Jurjān, al-Rayy, and Fārs and head of security in Madīnat al-Salām. One of Ya'- qūb's companions, Dirham b. Naṣr, was present at the audience. Al-Mu'tamid had sent this Dirham from Sāmarrā to Ya'qūb [with a message] granting the latter what he had requested.[475] Dirham went to Ya'qūb accompanied by 'Umar b. Sīmā and Muḥammad b. Tarkashah.

474. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 290, commences his account of this year by stating that Ya'qūb journeyed from Fārs to al-Ahwāz in the month of al-Muḥarram; Rāmhurmuz was only a three-day march east of al-Ahwāz.

Messengers of Ibn Zaydawayh arrived in Baghdad during the month of Rabī' I (December 14, 875 – January 12, 876) this year to deliver a communication from him. A robe of honor was bestowed upon him by Abū Aḥmad (al-Muwaffaq).

Later this same year those who had been sent by Ya'qūb b. al-Layth returned to the Caliph and informed him that Ya'qūb was not satisfied with merely corresponding with the Caliph, but he rather preferred to come in person to the caliphal palace. Ya'qūb left 'Askar Mukram,[476] while Abū al-Sāj went to meet him, and was received honorably and given presents. After the messengers had returned with Ya'qūb's reply, al-Mu'tamid, on Saturday the 3rd of Jumādā II (March 15, 876), assembled his troops in al-Qā'im, in Sāmarrā, leaving his son Ja'far in charge of Sāmarrā with the assistance of Muḥammad al-Muwallad. Departing from the city on Tuesday the 6th of Jumādā II (March 18, 876), al-Mu'tamid reached Baghdad on Wednesday the 14th of the month (March 26, 876). He passed straight through the metropolis, however, and proceeded to al-Za'farāniyyah, where he set up camp. From al-Za'farāniyyah he sent [1893] ahead his brother Abū Aḥmad as vanguard, while Ya'qūb proceeded with his army from 'Askar Mukram, arriving within a farsakh's[477] distance of Wāsiṭ. There he encountered flooded terrain created by Masrūr al-Balkhī, who had breached the dike on the Tigris in order to hinder Ya'qūb's passage. Ya'qūb remained there and managed to repair the breach, which allowed him to cross over the Tigris on the 24th of Jumādā II (March 23, 876) and advance toward Bādhibīn.[478] The next stage was the arrival of Muḥammad b. Kathīr, on behalf of Ya'qūb, opposite the camp of Masrūr al-Balkhī, who then proceeded with his army to al-Nu'māniyyah.[479]

475. That is, the governorships to which he had been appointed.

476. An important town on the Masruqān canal, which irrigated some of the richest land in Khūzistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 236.

477. About 6 km.

478. Located east of Wāsiṭ, on the road to al-Ahwāz, Le Strange, Lands, 82, vocalizes the name Bādhbīn.

479. The halfway stage between Baghdad and Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 796.

Meanwhile, Yaʿqūb had reached Wāsiṭ and entered it on the 24th of Jumādā II (March 23, 876). On Thursday, the last day of the month (March 29, 876), al-Muʿtamid left al-Zaʿfarāniyyah and advanced as far as Sīb Banī Kūmā,[480] where he was joined by Masrūr al-Balkhī who had traveled along the western bank of the Tigris before crossing over to the side where the Caliph's forces were located. Al-Muʿtamid remained in Sīb Banī Kūmā for a few days in order that his various troops and regiments could assemble together. For his part, Yaʿqūb advanced by stages from Wāsiṭ to Dayr al-ʿĀqūl[481] and from there toward the government forces. Al-Muʿtamid remained camped in Sīb, along with ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā, while he sent his brother Abū Aḥmad to engage Yaʿqūb in battle. Abū Aḥmad stationed Mūsā b. Bughā on his right flank and Masrūr al-Balkhī on his left, while he himself, with his elite cavalry and the pick of his infantry, held the center. The two sides met on Sunday, at the beginning of Rajab (April 1, 876), at a place called Iḍṭarbad,[482] which was [1894] between Sīb Banī Kūmā and Dayr al-ʿĀqūl. Yaʿqūb's right wing attacked Abū Aḥmad's left flank, driving it back in disorder. A large number were slain, including some of the government's commanders, like Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā al-Turkī, Ṭabāghū al-Turkī, Muḥammad Ṭughtā al-Turkī, and one known as al-Mubaraqaʿ al-Maghribī, among others. Then those [on the left flank] who had been driven back regrouped, while the rest of Abū Aḥmad's forces stood their ground and launched a counterattack against Yaʿqūb's forces. They stood their ground and engaged the foe with courage and determination. Many of Yaʿqūb's valiant warriors were killed, among them al-Ḥasan al-Dirhamī and Muḥammad b. Kathīr, who had been in charge of Yaʿqūb's vanguard, and one known as Lubbādah. Yaʿqūb himself was struck by three arrows in his neck and hands. According to what was said, the two sides continued fighting until the time the afternoon prayer had passed. Later, al-Dayrānī and Muḥammad b. Aws reached Abū Aḥmad, completing the assembly of all of Abū

480. Situated on the east bank of the Tigris between Dayr al-ʿĀqūl and al-Madāʾin, this small town was called Sīb of the Banū Kūmā to distinguish it from the Sīb farther south. See Le Strange, Lands, 36, 41; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 41.

481. This was a monastery located on the east bank of the Tigris, south of al-Madāʾin. See Le Strange, Lands, 35; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 41; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 676.

482. The word is unvocalized in Manuscripts B and C.

Aḥmad's troops. It had become apparent that many on Ya'qūb's side had developed an aversion to fighting with him when they saw the Caliph appear on the battlefield, and [the assembled government troops] now attacked Ya'qūb and those who still stood firmly by him. Ya'qūb's regular troops were routed, leaving him to stand fast with the elite of his forces until they managed to withdraw from the field of battle.

More than ten thousand pack animals and mules were reportedly captured from Ya'qūb's army along with a great many containers of musk and such an amount of dinars and dirhams that it wore out its bearers.

Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. 'Abdallāh, who had been shackled in irons, was set free by the one who was in charge of guarding him. He was then presented to the Caliph, who bestowed upon him a robe of honor to accord with his rank. A statement was read out in public, in which it was said: [1895]

> The accursed renegade called Ya'qūb b. al-Layth had always professed loyalty [to the central authorities] until he committed such foul acts as marching upon the governor of Khurāsān and overthrowing him; acting as leader of the public prayers there and committing other misdeeds; marching repeatedly into Fārs and seizing its revenues; advancing upon the seat of the Commander of the Faithful, on the pretext of requesting powers of which the Commander of the Faithful had already given him more than he deserved, in an attempt to appease him and avoid [direct contact] by taking a better way. Ya'qūb had been given authority over Khurāsān, al-Rayy, Fārs, Qazwīn, Zanjān, and the security forces in Madīnat al-Salām. He was ordered to be humble in his correspondence. He had been granted valuable estates as fiefs; but that had only made him more unjust and oppressive. The Caliph then ordered him to turn back [from his march on Baghdad], but he refused. When the accursed one was on the road between Madīnat al-Salām and Wāsiṭ, flying flags, some of which bore the sign of the cross, the Commander of the Faithful set out to repel him.
>
> The Commander of the Faithful despatched his brother Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq bi-Allāh, the Muslims' future ruler, in the center of his army, with Abū 'Imrān Mūsā b. Bughā on the right flank and Ibrāhīm b. Sīmā on its outer wing. Abū Hāshim Masrūr al-Balkhī occupied the left flank and al-Dayrānī its outer wing. Ya'qūb and his supporters rushed into battle, and he fought until he was severely wounded and Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir was safely rescued from the enemy's hands. Ya'qūb's forces retreated in full flight, broken and plundered, while the accursed one was forced to surrender all his accumulated fortune.

This statement was dated Tuesday, the 11th of Rajab (April 10, 876).

Al-Mu'tamid then returned to his army camp and wrote to Ibn [1896] Wāṣil, granting him the governorship of Fārs. Ibn Wāṣil had already gone there to gather together some forces. Al-Mu'tamid returned to al-Madā'in, while Abū Aḥmad, along with Masrūr and Sātikīn and a number of the commanders, proceeded to confiscate the property of Abū al-Sāj in the form of estates and buildings, which were then granted to Masrūr al-Balkhī as fiefs. On Monday, the 16th of Rajab (April 15, 876) Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. 'Abdallāh came to Baghdad, his post having been restored, and a robe of honor was bestowed upon him in al-Ruṣāfah. He settled in the palace of 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir; he removed no one and appointed no one, but was ordered to receive five hundred thousand dirhams.

The day of the battle between the central authorities and [Ya'qūb] al-Ṣaffār was Palm Sunday (yawm al-Sha'ānīn).

Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Fayd al-Ṭā'ī praised Abū Aḥmad in a poem in which the business with al-Ṣaffār was alluded to.

The raven crowed—would that I could end his crowing—and my heart inclined to remembrance of beloved ones.
The raven proclaimed their departure, and my eyes responded to the departure of their saddles with a flood of tears.
They vanished, gentle ladies, like painted dolls, gentle friends;[483] like doe-eyed creatures, slender-waisted, full-bosomed.

---

483. Atrāb. For this expression, see Qur'ān 38:52, 56:37.

These fair ladies of yours made me adore them by their locks, figures, and brows.
The Muslims' heir apparent has many honorable [1897] qualities, the light from which has shone out in many offices
And ranks the summit of which cannot be scaled.
How noble are these peaks and ranks!
Al-Ṣaffār had arrived with impressive battle machines but suffered a terrible calamity, Fate having dealt him a swift end in obedient execution of providence.
The accursed devil, Iblīs, had seduced him with his plot and lured him with a false promise Until, when they became allies and al-Ṣaffār imagined he was mighty among armies and regiments, Fortunate troops advanced toward him, and they met, pushing forward with victorious banner,
In a huge, clamoring army in which heroes were seen bearing shields, spears, and arrows.
The Imām appeared with triumphant flag for Muḥammad—God's keen-honed sword.
The Muslims' heir apparent is Blessed of God,[484] swifter than a shooting star, Appearing among the people as a full shining moon, [1898] rejoicing in light, among the stars.
When they met with Mashrāfī swords and spears, piercing and thrusting in combat hand to hand,
The dust swirled round, above it a cloud scattering a rain [of arrows].
He routed the multitude with the decisiveness of a piercing opinion, separating comrades one from another.
God's blessing upon he who is with him, who is blessed (muwaffaq) and joyous, steadfast and persistent in battle.
O horsemen of the Arabs, [there is] no other the likes of whom can be found, who is equal to disasters That might come from evil times or from facing an army that is treacherous, treasonous, and violent.

---

484. The regnal name of Mu'tamid's brother Abū Aḥmad, al-Muwaffaq 'alā-Allāh means "Blessed of God."

In this year the Zanj leader despatched his forces to the territory of the salt flats and Dastumīsān.[485]

An Account of [the Zanj Attack on the Salt Flats][486]

The cause for this reportedly was that, when al-Mu'tamid removed Mūsā b. Bughā from his responsibilities for the eastern provinces and their adjoining districts, he included them instead with his brother Abū Aḥmad's duties. Abū Aḥmad himself added the Tigris districts to the duties of Masrūr al-Balkhī. Thus, as the districts of the Tigris had been left without any government protection except for al-Madā'in and regions lying to the north,[487] Ya'qūb b. al-Layth [1899] commenced his advance toward Abū Aḥmad and reached Wāsiṭ. Just prior to this Masrūr had sent Ju'lān al-Turkī to al-Bādhāward in place of Mūsā b. Utāmish. Now opposing Mūsā b. Utāmish on the Zanj side was Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. Before Ibn Utāmish was removed from al-Bādhāward, Sulaymān had already inflicted some damage on his army. Following his removal and replacement by Ju'lān, despatched a Baḥraynī called Tha'lab b. Ḥafṣ to attack Ju'lān. Tha'lab succeeded in inflicting casualties on both his cavalry and men. For his part the Zanj leader sent Aḥmad b. Mahdī, a man from Jubbā,[488] in command of galleys with marksmen on board and with orders to proceed to Nahr al-Mar'ah.[489] According to report, this man, al-Jubbā'ī, commenced plundering the villages in the neighborhood of al-Madhār, laying them waste before returning to Nahr al-Mar'ah, where he stationed himself. He communicated with the Zanj leader informing him that the salt flats were void of government troops, owing to the removal of Masrūr and his troops when Ya'qūb b. Layth arrived in Wāsiṭ. The Zanj leader then ordered Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and a number of his commanders to march to al-Ḥawānīt. He also gave orders to one of the Bāhilīs, 'Umayr b. 'Ammār,[490] who knew

485. The word is vocalized thus in the Leiden edition, though it is also written Dast Maysān.

486. See Popovic, Révolte, 112–15; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 290–92.

487. That is, between al-Madā'in and Baghdad.

488. A town on the estuary of the Dujayl below al-Ahwāz. See Le Strange, Lands, 243.

489. This canal was the northernmost of nine lying to the west of the Tigris estuary. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 303, 305; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 844.

490. On the Bāhilah tribe, see Popovic, Révolte, 112 n. 3.

well the roads and byways through the salt flats to accompany al-Jubbā'ī and establish camp in al-Ḥawānīt.[491]

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported that Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān [1900] al-ʿAbbādānī said that, following the Zanj leader's decision to despatch his armies to the salt flats and Dastumīsān, he commanded Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ to set up camp in al-Muṭṭawwiʿah and Sulaymān b. Mūsā was to establish his quarters at the head of Nahr al-Yahūdī;[492] these orders were carried out. They each remained in their camps until receiving word to advance: Sulaymān b. Mūsā proceeded to the village of al-Qādisiyyah and Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ to al-Ḥawānīt, while al-Jubbā'ī was stationed with his galleys in front of this latter Sulaymān's army. Meanwhile, Abbā al-Turkī[493] sailed along the Tigris with thirty barges heading for the camp of the Zanj leader. Passing the village, which had made peace with the abominable one, he destroyed and burned it. The abominable one[494] contacted Sulaymān b. Mūsā by despatch to prevent his returning and Sulaymān blocked Abbā al-Turkī's way by engaging him in battle for a whole month until he managed to reach the region of the salt flats.

Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān reported that Jabbāsh the eunuch (al-khādim) claimed it was not Abbā al-Turkī who had ventured along the Tigris at this time but rather Nuṣayr Abū Ḥamzah.

When Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ reportedly set out for al-Ḥawānīt, he reached a place called Nahr al-ʿAtīq, while al-Jubbā'ī, who had gone along the al-Mādiyān Road,[495] encountered Rumays, whom he engaged in battle and defeated. Al-Jubbā'ī captured twenty-four galleys and some thirty-odd larger craft (ṣalghah). Rumays escaped and [1901] took refuge in the woods. A group of the Jūkhāniyyīn[496] came upon 491. The word means "booths." Al-Ḥawānīt was situated on the eastern bank of the Tigris. Near there barriers, supervised by government officials, were moored across the river. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 46.

492. One of the canals of al-Baṣrah on its western side; it lay between Nahr al-Ubullah and Nahr Abī al-Khaṣīb. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 304, 306.

493. The copyists of Manuscripts B and C wrote his name with tashdīd, thus Abbā. Popovic Révolte, 112 n. 4, misreads this name as Abū al-Turkī and incorrectly identifies the patronymic as belonging to Masrūr al-Balkhī, whose kunyah was Abū Hāshim. The context of the passage on p. 178, below, makes this identification impossible. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 293, calls him Ibn al-Turkī.

494. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 293, who follows Ṭabarī closely here, lapses for the first time into calling ʿAlī b. Muḥammad "the abominable one" (al-khabīth).

495. The reading is conjectural.

496. See Ṭabarī, Glossarium, CLXXIV.

him and carried him off, but he manged to escape again. In their flight, Rumays's troops ran straight into Sulaymān (b. Jāmiʿ), who was just then emerging from Nahr al-ʿAtīq. In the ensuing battle, Rumays's forces were decimated while Rumays himself made his way to a place called Barr Musāwir. A number of the Bilāliyyah were reported to have joined up with Sulaymān with some one hundred fifty galleys. He interrogated them concerning what lay before him. They replied that neither government authority nor agents were present in the region between him and Wāsiṭ. Placing complete trust in this intelligence, Sulaymān was thrown off his guard and as he reached a spot called al-Jazīrah, he was met by one Abū Muʿādh al-Qurashī, who fought and routed Sulaymān, killing a number of his troops and capturing one of the Zanj commanders, Riyāḥ al-Qandalī. Sulaymān returned to his base camp, where two of the Bilāliyyah came and told him that there was no one in Wāsiṭ to defend it other than Abū Muʿādh with the five barges with which he had previously met him. So Sulaymān made his preparations, gathered his forces together, and sent word to the abominable one with some of the Bilāliyyah who had sought his protection, keeping a small select group to remain behind with him with ten galleys. However, the two who had informed him of the situation in Wāsiṭ he kept under close guard as he set out for Nahr Abān. Abū Muʿādh blocked his way and this sparked off fighting between the two sides. A strong [1902] wind blew up, causing Abū Muʿādh's barges to flounder and giving Sulaymān and his men the chance to overpower him. Abū Muʿādh, nevertheless, managed to make good his escape while Sulaymān proceeded toward the Nahr Abān, where he swiftly burned and plundered [villages], taking women and children into captivity. News of this reached some of Abū Aḥmad's agents who were staying on one of his estates on the Nahr Sindād. They set out against Sulaymān with a detachment of troops, and in the battle that followed a large number of the Zanj were slain. Sulaymān and Aḥmad b. Mahdī and their followers fled back to their camp.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan — Muḥammad b. ʿUthmān said that when Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ had installed himself in al-Ḥawānit and set up a temporary camp on the Nahr Yaʿqūb b. al-Naḍr, he sent out someone to collect intelligence on Wāsiṭ and the disposition of government forces there. This was after the departure of Masrūr and his troops, owing to the arrival of Yaʿqūb (b. al-Layth). The spy returned to Sulaymān and reported Ya'qūb's advance toward the government forces. Masrūr, before vacating Wāsiṭ for al-Sīb, had sent a man called Waṣīf al-Raḥḥāl with barges against Sulaymān. He fought and killed him, also seizing seven of the boats and killing the prisoners, dumping the dead in al-Ḥawānīt in order to instill fear in the hearts of government supporters who might happen by.[497]

After Sulaymān had received news of Masrūr's departure from Wāsiṭ, he summoned his deputy, 'Umayr b. 'Ammār, and one of the Bāhilī chiefs named Aḥmad b. Sharīk. He consulted them concerning withdrawal from the position, which could be reached by horses and boats, searching carefully instead for a spot joining a road that could be used as an escape route should he wish to make for the camp of the abominable one. The two men advised him to head for 'Aqr Māwar and entrench himself in Ṭahīthā[498] and its dense thickets. [1903]

The departure of Sulaymān b. Jāni' greatly annoyed the Bāhilites since, having become involved with him, they feared the retribution of the central authorities against them. Sulaymān set out with his troops to Ṭahītha via Nahr al-Barūr, having despatched al-Jubbā'ī to Nahr al-'Atīq with galleys. He ordered al-Jubbā'ī to make haste in bringing him intelligence on the strength of the government's forces in men and barges. He left behind a detachment of blacks to sent on any of his troops who had lagged behind. He headed for 'Aqr Māwar, setting up camp in the village of Qaryat Marwān, located on an island on the eastern side of Nahr Ṭahītha. There he gathered the Bāhilite chiefs and the men of al-Ṭufūf[499] and wrote to the abominable one, informing him of his movements. The abominable one replied, approving his plans and ordered him to transfer to him food supplies and animals that he had acquired. This was duly done. Meanwhile, Masrūr had proceeded to the spot of Sulaymān's previous camp. He found nothing there but that the enemy had already transferred their entire camp.

---

497. Popovic, Révolte, 113, takes this possibly to mean that the bodies were thrown into the Tigris at al-Ḥawānīt.

498. See Popovic, Révolte, 113 n. 1, where he states that the camp was located on the Ṭahītha canal. The reading Ṭahītha is uncertain. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 293, writes it ṭ-h-th-a and reverses the relationship between it and 'Aqr Māwar; that is, Sulaymān was advised to entrench himself in the latter position.

499. Ahl al-Ṭufūf. The Index does not cite this as a place name, and it cannot be otherwise identified. It might also be loosely rendered "local inhabitants," that is, those living in cultivated areas along the canal banks. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ṭ-f-f.

Abbā al-Turkī descended toward the marshlands in pursuit of Sulaymān, who himself thought that [Abbā al-Turkī] had left the district altogether and gone away, heading in the direction of the abominable one's camp. He found no trace of Sulaymān. On his return, however, he discovered that Sulaymān had moved an army to al-Ḥa-
[1904] wānīt in order to surprise any stragglers who might become separated from Masrūr's army. Abbā al-Turkī avoided the road that he feared might lead him to Sulaymān's army and instead took another way, which finally brought him to Masrūr, whom he informed that he had no news of Sulaymān's [exact] whereabouts.[500]

Sulyamān's army set out for [the abominable one] with the required provisions. Sulaymān remained behind. He despatched al-Jubbā'ī with the barges to take care of the food and supply depots and arrange their transport. Al-Jubbā'ī, however, burned such food supplies as he found wherever he went. This greatly displeased Sulaymān, who forbade him from such action but al-Jubbā'ī paid no attention, justifying himself on the grounds that the supplies would benefit their enemies and that it was wrong to leave anything behind. At this Sulaymān wrote to the abominable one complaining about al-Jubbā'ī's behavior. The abominable one in turn instructed al-Jubbā'ī to obey Sulaymān and accept whatever he commanded.

News reached Sulaymān that Aghartimish and Khushaysh[501] were heading his way, leading cavalry and infantry troops with barges and galleys intending to engage him in battle. Sulaymān was much troubled by these developments and sent off al-Jubbā'ī to glean information about them. He commenced his preparations to meet them. Al-Jubbā'ī returned shortly thereafter in flight and informed Sulaymān that Aghartimish and Khushaysh had reached Bāb Ṭanj, which was only half a farsakh[502] from Sulaymān's forces. Sulaymān ordered al-Jubbā'ī to return and block their army's way, diverting it from advancing directly toward his camp until Sulaymān could join forces with him. When al-Jubbā'ī had departed to execute these or-[1905] ders, Sulaymān ascended a rooftop, from which he observed the advancing army. Then, hastily descending, he crossed over Nahr Ṭahīthā and proceeded on foot, followed by a number of the command-

500. See n. 493, above.

501. The vocalization of the names of these two 'Abbāsid officers is conjectural. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 293, refers to the second as Ḥashīsh.

502. About 3 km.

ers of the blacks and their troops, finally arriving at Bāb Ṭanj. Aghartimish realized that he had arrived too late and left his troops to struggle back to his camp.

Sulaymān had ordered the deputy commander of his army not to allow any of the blacks to appear in view of any of Aghartimish's army, concealing themselves as best they could and letting the enemy penetrate along the waterway. Then, when they heard the sound of the drum roll, they should emerge and attack Aghartimish. Aghartimish approached with his army until there was no more than the Jārūrah Banī Marwān canal, which flowed from Ṭahīthā, between him and Sulaymān's force. Al-Jubbā'ī fled in the galleys and reached Ṭahīthā, and then leaving them there he retraced his way on foot to Sulaymān's army. This caused fear to deepen among Sulaymān's soldiers, and they scattered to the four winds.[503] A small group of men, however, among them one of the commanders of the blacks called Abū al-Nidā', took heart and attacked the enemy, preventing their entry into the camp, while Sulaymān pressed them from behind; then the Zanj beat their drums and throwing themselves into the water, crossed over the canal to join them. At this Aghartimish's troops were routed; the blacks who were in Ṭahītha fell upon them and put them to the sword. Khushaysh set out, riding upon a gray horse, intending to return to his soldiers, but he was met by blacks, who felled him with their swords and slew him. His head [1906] was taken to Sulaymān. Before being killed, as he was dragged away, he had said to them, "I am Khushaysh; you cannot kill me. Take me to your leader!" but they paid him no heed.

Aghartimish fled at the rear of his forces until he collapsed on the ground; he then proceeded on horseback, tracked by the Zanj until they reached their camp. The Zanj obtained their necessities from it, and seized Khushaysh's barges, while those who pursued the retreating army captured [more] barges that were with Aghartimish, containing much wealth. When news of this reached Aghartimish, he returned and managed to recover the boats from the Zanj.

Meanwhile, Sulaymān returned to his troops. He had succeeded in capturing booty and animals and sent word of the result of the battle to the Zanj commander, together with Khushaysh's head and ring seal, and added the barges that he had seized to his own forces. When the abominable one received Sulaymān's communication and Khushaysh's head, he ordered the latter circulated throughout the camp and then displayed for a day on a pole. The head was later sent to 'Alī b. Abān, who at the time was in the districts of al-Ahwāz, and he was ordered to display it in public there as well. Sulaymān, al-Jubbā'ī, and a group of commanders of the blacks left for the district of al-Ḥawānīt, skirting its border. There they came across thirteen barges with Abū Tamīm, the brother of Abū 'Awn, associate of Waṣīf al-Turkī. They attacked. Abū Tamīm was killed and thrown into the water. Eleven of his barges were confiscated.

503. The phrase is fa tafarraqū ayādiya sabā; see H. Wehr, A Dictionary of Modern Written Arabic, s.v. s-b-'.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said that this was the account of Muḥammad b. 'Uthmān al-'Abbādānī. As for Jabbāsh the eunuch, he claimed that Abū Tamīm had only eight barges. Two of these, which had arrived late on the scene, managed to slip away safely with all on [1907] board. Sulaymān captured arms and spoils as well as most of the troops on the barges. Sulaymān returned to his camp and sent word to the abominable one of developments involving the slaying of Abū Tamīm and his companions and his confiscation of the barges in his camp.

In this year Ibn Zaydawayh took al-Ṭīb[504] by surprise and plundered it.

'Alī b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Shawārib was appointed to the office of religious judge this year.[505]

Al-Ḥusayn b. Ṭāhir b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir left Baghdad during the last days of [the month][506] for al-Jabal.

Al-Ṣalābī[507] died this year, and Kayghalagh was appointed governor of al-Rayy.

Ṣāliḥ b. 'Alī b. Ya'qūb b. (Abū al-Ja'far) al-Manṣūr died in Rabī' II (January 3–31, 876) of this year. Ismā'īl b. Isḥāq was appointed re-504. Le Strange, Lands, 64, 82. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 566, says that in his day (the seven/thirteenth century) the inhabitants of this southeastern Iraqi town were Nabatean and still spoke a dialect of Aramaic.

---

505. That is, the brother of al-Ḥasan, who had been appointed chief religious judge in 252/866 and had died in 261/874–75. See p. 167 and n. 6 above; Sourdel, Vizirat, II, 654.

506. Ṭabarī does not mention the actual month, but Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 304, places this event in Ṣafar (November 5–December 3, 875).

507. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 305, here confirms that he had been governor of al-Rayy.

ligious judge of the east side of Baghdad, thus holding the judgeship of both sides of the city.

Muḥammad b. ʿAttāb b. ʿAttāb was killed this year. He had been appointed governor of the two Sībs and had departed for the place, when he was killed by Arab tribesmen.

In the middle of Ramaḍān (June 12, 876) this year Mūsā b. Bughā arrived at al-Anbār on his way to al-Raqqah.

In this year al-Qaṭṭān, associate of Mufliḥ, was also slain. He was in charge of the administration of the taxes (kharāj) of Mosul. He was killed on the way back from it.

Kaftimur ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. Dāʾūd, secretary of Aḥmad b. Sahl al-Luṭfī, was made leader of the Mecca Road in Ramaḍān (May 29–June 27, 876) of this year. [1908]

In Mecca the corn merchants (al-ḥannāṭīn)[508] and butchers fought each other on the day before yawm al-Tarwiyah,[509] so that people feared the pilgrimage would be canceled. Then the two sides made peace so that people could perform the pilgrimage rites. Seventeen persons had been killed.

Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth conquered Fārs this year, and Ibn Wāṣil fled from it.

A battle occurred this year between the Zanj and Aḥmad b. Laythawayh, in which many Zanj were killed. Abū Dāʾūd al-Ṣuʿlūk, who had been with the Zanj, was captured.

An Account of the Battle and Capture of al-Ṣuʿlūk[510]

Masrūr al-Balkhī reportedly sent Aḥmad b. Laythawayh to the region of the districts of al-Ahwāz. When he arrived in the region he settled at al-Sūs.[511] (Abū Layth) al-Ṣaffār had appointed Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Azārmard al-Kurdī governor of the districts of al-Ahwāz. Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh corresponded with the Zanj leader, 508. The editor of the Leiden text has preferred this reading, though Manuscript B is unpointed and C has the possible reading khayyāṭīn "tailors," which is also the reading of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 306.

509. This day, when pilgrims provided themselves with water for the afterlife, was the 8th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (September 2, 876), the day before that of ʿArafāt. See EI,² s.v. "Ḥadjdj."

510. Popovic, Révolte, 114–15.

511. The ancient Sūsa, situated on the banks of the Karkhah river in Khūzistān. See Le Strange, Lands, 240.

holding forth the prospect that he was ready to go over to his side; indeed, he had been corresponding with him from the beginning of the Zanj leader's revolt. Muḥammad gave the impression that he would govern the districts of al-Ahwāz for him, although he would pretend to be loyal to (Abū Layth) al-Ṣaffār until he[512] had firm control of the district. The abominable one agreed to this, on condition [1909] that his governor in the region be 'Alī b. Abān and that Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh be only his deputy, an offer that he accepted.

'Alī b. Abān despatched his brother al-Khalīl with a large number of blacks and others, while Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh, together with Abū Dā'ūd al-Ṣu'lūk, bolstered these forces, and they all made for al-Sūs. They did not, however, get that far, as Ibn Laythawayh and the troops of the central authorities accompanying him forced 'Alī's troops to withdraw in full flight, losing a great many killed and others captured. Pushing forward, Aḥmad b. Laythawayh reached Junday Sābūr.[513]

Meanwhile, 'Alī b. Abān left al-Ahwāz to lend Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh assistance against Aḥmad b. Laythawayh. Muḥammad, with a troop of Kurds and a ragtag collection of others (ṣa'ālīk), met up with 'Alī, and, as Muḥammad approached each side proceeded along opposite banks of the Masruqān canal.[514] Muḥammad sent one of his aides with three hundred horsemen to join 'Alī b. Abān. Both men arrived finally at 'Askar Mukram. Muḥammad went alone to 'Alī b. Abān, the two men meeting (for awhile) to discuss matters. Upon returning to his camp, Muḥammad sent to 'Alī al-Qāsim b. 'Alī and one of the Kurdish chiefs named Ḥāzim and a shaykh called al-Ṭalāqānī from among the associates of (Abū Layth) al-Ṣaffār; they arrived and greeted 'Alī. Muḥammad and 'Alī remained amicable until 'Alī reached the Fārs bridge (qanṭarah) and Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallah entered Tustar. It reached Aḥmad b. Laythaway's attention that 'Alī b. Abān and Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh planned to assist each other in fighting him, and so he departed from [1910] Junday Sābūr and made for al-Sūs.

Now 'Alī reached the Fārs bridge on Friday. Muḥammad b. 'Ubay-

512. It is not clear whether the pronoun refers to Muḥammad or to the Zanj leader.

513. Written thus in the text but also found as Jundī Sābūr. See Le Strange, Lands, 238.

514. A canal that left the Dujayl river and rejoined it at a point near the city of 'Askar Mukram. See Le Strange, Lands, 236–37.

dallāh had promised him to have the preacher make a sermon[515] that day and invoke blessings upon the leader of the Zanj and ʿAlī from the minbar[516] of the mosque in Tustar. ʿAlī remained [at the Fārs bridge], expecting such to happen, and he sent Bahbūdh b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb to attend the Friday prayer and bring him news of it. When the prayer session commenced, the preacher rose and invoked blessings upon al-Muʿtamid, [Abu Layth] al-Ṣaffār, and Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh. Bahbūdh returned to ʿAlī with this news. Immediately ʿAlī set out upon his horse and ordered his troops to leave for al-Ahwāz, sending them on in front of him with his nephew Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ, Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Kirmānī his deputy, and his secretary. ʿAlī stayed behind until his troops had crossed over the bridge, and then he destroyed it so that he could not be followed by horses.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said: "I was among those of ʿAlī's troops who had been sent on ahead. The army traveled swiftly all that night, reaching ʿAskar Mukram by sunrise. ʿAskar Mukram had negotiated a peace with the abominable one, but now his soldiers broke the pact, attacking and pillaging the city. ʿAlī b. Abān arrived in the wake of what the troops had done, found out what they had done, but was unable to change it, and proceeded directly to al-Ahwāz. When word of ʿAlī's withdrawal reached Aḥmad b. Laythawayh, he retraced his way toward Tustar. There he clashed with Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh and his followers. Muḥammad escaped, but the one called Abū Dāʾūd al-Ṣuʿluk fell into Aḥmad's hands, and he was transported to the court of the al-Muʿtamid. Aḥmad himself remained in Tustar."

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—al-Faḍl b. ʿAdī al-Dārimī, one of the associates of the Zanj leader who had been attached to Muḥammad b. Abān, ʿAlī's brother, recounted as follows: After Aḥmad b. Laythawayh had settled himself in Tustar, ʿAlī b. Abān set out with his army toward him. He stopped at a village called Baranjān, and arranged for scouts to bring him information about Aḥmad. They re- [1911]

515. The sermon (al-khuṭbah) has a fixed place in the Friday service in the mosque. It was customary for the preacher to mention the name of the sovereign in the prayer on behalf of the faithful, thus indicating the preacher's political opinion or loyalty. See EI,[2] s.v. "Khuṭba."

516. The "pulpit" of a mosque, from which the Friday prayer is given. See EI,[2] s.v. "Masdjid."

turned to tell him that Ibn Laythawayh was already on his way, his forward cavalry having reached a village called al-Bāhiliyyīn. 'Alī advanced toward Aḥmad, spreading good cheer among his troops, promising them victory, and recounting to them [the exploits] of the abominable one.

When 'Alī reached al-Bāhiliyyīn, Ibn Laythawayh met him with his cavalry of around four hundred horsemen; they were quickly joined by reinforcements. As the government's cavalry forces were overwhelming in numbers, a group of Arab tribesmen who were on the side of 'Alī b. Abān sought safe-conduct to join Ibn Laythawayh. The remainder of 'Alī's cavalry was routed with only a small detachment of foot soldiers standing firm, most of them too having scattered. The fighting intensified between the two sides and 'Alī b. Abān dismounted and joined the battle by himself on foot with one of his slave soldiers called Fatḥ, who was known as the slave of Abū al-Ḥadīd, joining him in the fray. Abu Naṣr Salhab and Badr al-Rūmī al-Sha'rānī, who knew 'Alī by sight, spotted him and shouted a warning to the troops. 'Alī fled seeking the safety of the Masruqān canal. He threw himself into the water, followed by Fatḥ who threw himself into the water, followed by Fatḥ who threw himself in after 'Alī, but he drowned. 'Alī b. Abān reached Naṣr al-Rūmī, who pulled him out of the water and put him aboard a galley, 'Alī having received a wound in the leg from an arrow. Utterly defeated, he escaped. A large number of Zanj solders and their brave ones had been slain.

[1912] In this year al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq b. al-Ḥasan b. al-'Abbās b. Muḥammad led the pilgrimage.[517]

517. The same person who led the pilgrimage in the previous year.

The Events of the Year 263

(SEPTEMBER 24, 876–SEPTEMBER 12, 877)

Among the events taking place this year was the victory of 'Uzayz b. al-Sarī, the associate of Ya'qūb b. al-Layth, over Muḥammad b. Wāṣil, who was taken prisoner.

In this year as well there occurred a battle between Mūsā Dāljuwayh[518] and Arab tribesmen in the district of al-Anbār. They defeated and routed him. Abū Aḥmad sent his son Aḥmad with a group of his commanders to seek out the tribesmen responsible for Mūsā Dāljuwayh's defeat.

This year, too, [Abū Aḥmad] al-Dayrānī attacked [Muḥammad] b. Aws. He launched the assault during the night, dispersing his personnel and plundering his camp. Ibn Aws escaped and made his way to Wāsiṭ.

One of the Farāghinah appeared along the Mosul Road this year indulging in highway robbery. He was finally captured and killed.

Ya'qūb b. al-Layth advanced from Fārs this year and, when he reached al-Nūbandajān,[519] Aḥmad b. Laythawayh departed from

518. The reading is uncertain.

519. A city in the district of Anburān, in Fārs province. See Le Strange, Lands, 262–65.

Tustar. Then Ya'qūb this year headed for al-Ahwāz. Before his departure from Tustar, Aḥmad had engaged in a battle against the brother of 'Alī b. Abān, who was defeated; many of his Zanj troops were taken.[520]

[1913] An Account of [the] Battle [at 'Askar Mukram][521]

Following Ibn Laythawayh's defeat of 'Alī b. Abān with the Bāhiliyyīn in which he had been wounded, 'Alī reportedly reached al-Ahwāz but, without remaining there, made his way to the camp[522] of his master, the Zanj leader. There he was treated for his wounds until he completely recovered.

'Alī then set out again for al-Ahwāz, despatching at the same time his brother al-Khalīl b. Abān and his nephew Abū Sahl Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ with a huge army against Ibn Laythawayh, who at the time was stationed in 'Askar Mukram. The two men advanced with their forces and were met by Ibn Laythawayh, who was heading toward them about a farsakh from 'Askar Mukram. The two sides drew upon each other and Ibn Laythawayh, who had prepared an ambush, fell back when fighting flared up. In their zeal to get him, the Zanj pursued him, passing by the ambush Ibn Laythawayh had set up. The ambushers emerged behind the Zanj, who were routed and scattered. Ibn Laythawayh then turned back to attack them and finished the job, while the Zanj returned to base in full flight. Ibn Laythawayh set off for Tustar, taking with him enemy heads. 'Alī b. Abān sent off to the Masruqān canal against Aḥmad b. Laythawayh another army detachment led by Ankluwayh. Ibn Laythawayh despatched thirty of his best cavalry to engage Ankalwayh and, when al-Khalīl b. Abān heard of their mission, he laid an ambush for them. They reached his position and he attacked; not one of them escaped, slain to the last man. Their heads were taken to 'Alī b. Abān in al-Ahwāz and he forwarded them to the abominable one.

Then [Ya'qūb] al-Ṣaffār arrived in al-Ahwāz, while Ibn Laythawayh fled from it.

---

520. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 307–8, adds the detail that Ya'qūb b. al-Layth established himself in Junday Sābūr before setting off for al-Ahwāz. Ṭabarī's account is disjointed, and he mentions this point farther on, at p. 187, below.

521. Popovic, Révolte, 115.

522. This would be a reference to 'Alī b. Muḥammad's capital, al-Mukhtārah.

An Account of [Yaʿqūb] al-Ṣaffār's Activities This Year[523] [1914]

When Yaʿqūb b. al-Layth reached Junday Sābūr and established himself there, all who were in the service of the central authorities had reportedly moved out of this district. Yaʿqūb sent to al-Ahwāz on his behalf a man called al-Ḥiṣn b. al-ʿAnbar.[524] As he approached the city, ʿAlī b. Abān, the associate of the Zanj leader, left and set up camp at the Nahr al-Sidrah.[525] Ḥiṣn[526] entered al-Ahwāz and established his quarters there. His troops and those of ʿAlī b. Abān began to make forays against each other, and both sides suffered losses. This continued until ʿAlī b. Abān was prepared to set out for al-Ahwāz where he clashed with al-Ḥiṣn and his troops in a vicious encounter in which a large number of Yaʿqūb's troops were killed, cavalry horses captured, and a great deal of booty seized. Al-Ḥiṣn and his followers fled to ʿAskar Mukram, while ʿAlī remained in al-Ahwāz confiscating what was left in it. He then returned to the Nahr al-Sidrah and instructed Bahbūdh to attack a Kurdish associate of [Yaʿqūb] al-Ṣaffār stationed in Dawraq.[527] Bahbūdh did as he was ordered and slew a number of his men, taking the Kurd prisoner. However, he acted generously toward the man and released him. After this, ʿAlī was expecting Yaʿqūb to set out against him, but he did not; instead he sent as support to al-Ḥiṣn b. al-ʿAnbar his brother al-Faḍl b. al-ʿAnbar and ordered them to refrain from confronting the abominable one's troops in battle and to restrict themselves to al-Ahwāz. Yaʿqūb wrote to ʿAlī b. Abān seeking to conclude a truce with him so that he might leave his troops in al-Ahwāz. ʿAlī rejected this proposal, unless he could transfer food supplies from the city. [Yaʿqūb] al-Ṣaffār withdrew, allowing him to move the food supplies while ʿAlī in turn withdrew, so Yaʿqūb could remove the [1915] animal forage in al-Ahwāz. So ʿAlī had the food supplies moved and left the forage and the two sides, both ʿAlī's and Yaʿqūb's troops, refrained from interfering with each other.

In this year, the Khārijite Musāwir b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd died.[528]

---

523. See Popovic, Révolte, 115–17.
524. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 308, calls him al-Khiḍr b. al-ʿAnbar.
525. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 258.
526. Here without the article.
527. A town in Khūzistān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 618–19.
528. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 309, supplies a few more details.

On Friday, the 10th of Dhū al-Qaʿdah of this year (August 24, 877) ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā b. Khāqān died, having fallen from his horse in the main square in a collision with his eunuch, Rashīq. With blood flowing from his nose and ears, he died three hours after his fall. Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawwakil performed the obsequies and accompanied the funeral procession.

The following day he appointed al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad as vizier.[529] Then, on the 27th of Dhū al-Qaʿdah (August 11, 877), Mūsā b. Bughā arrived in Sāmarrā, and al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad fled to Baghdad. In his place Sulaymān b. Wahb was appointed vizier, on the 6th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (August 20, 877). ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān was appointed secretary of al-Mufawwaḍ and al-Muwaffaq, in addition to his role of secretary to Mūsā b. Bughā. The palace of ʿUbaydallāh b. Yaḥyā was presented to Kayghalagh.

In this year the brother of Sharkab drove al-Ḥusayn b. Ṭāhir out of Naysābūr and occupied it. He forced its inhabitants to surrender to him a third of their wealth. Al-Ḥusayn went to Marv, where the brother of the Khwārazm Shāh[530] appealed to Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir.

In this year the Slavs surrendered Lu'lu'ah to the tyrant.[531]

In this year al-Faḍl b. Isḥāq b. al-Ḥasan b. Ismāʿīl led the pilgrimage.[532]

---

529. On these developments, see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 309ff.

530. See EI,[2] s.v. "Khʷārazm-Shāhs." Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 310, says it was the son, rather than the brother, who was in Marv.

531. See n. 461, above. "The tyrant" is Ṭabarī's epithet for the Byzantine emperor. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 308–9, gives more detail, revealing that the fortress was surrendered voluntarily by its garrison because payment of their allotments and supplies were long overdue.

532. This is the same person who led the pilgrimmage in the two previous years; his full name is given on p. 167, above.

The Events of the Year 264

(September 13, 877–September 2, 878)

The events taking place this year included the despatch of an army by Ya'qūb al-Ṣaffār to al-Ṣaymarah. Ya'qūb marched at the head of the army toward al-Ṣaymarah. Ṣayghūn was arrested and brought to Ya'qūb, and he died while being held his prisoner.[533]

On the 11th of al-Muḥarram (September 23, 877) Abū Aḥmad, together with Mūsā b. Bughā assembled the army in al-Qā'im (in Sāmarrā), and it was escorted in public procession by al-Mu'tamid. Then the two men departed from Sāmarrā on the 2nd of Ṣafar (October 14, 877). After they had reached Baghdad, Mūsā b. Bughā died, and he was transported back to Sāmarrā for burial.

In the month of Rabī' I (November 11–December 10, 877) Qabīḥah, the mother of al-Mu'tazz, died.

In this year Ibn al-Dayrānī went to al-Dīnawar,[534] where Ibn 'Iyāḍ 533. Manuscript C adds that he died on the 11th of al-Muḥarram (September 23, 877), though the copyist may have confused it with the line immediately following, on the mustering of the army by Abū Aḥmad, which (by coincidence?) occurred on the same day.

534. A city in the province of Jibāl, between Ḥulwān and Hamadhān. See Le Strange, Lands, 188, 189.

and Dulaf b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf united against him, forcing him to flee, after which they seized his property and estates. Ibn al-Dayrānī returned to Ḥulwān in defeat.

In this year as well, the Byzantines captured ʿAbdallāh b. Rashīd b. Kāwus.[535]

An Account of [the] Capture [of ʿAbdallāh b. Rashīd]

The reason for this was that ʿAbdallāh had entered Byzantine territory with four thousand troops of the Syrian frontier districts (thughūr).[536] He ventured to Ḥiṣnayn and al-Maskanīn.[537] The Muslims seized booty and then set off on the return journey. They had [1917] just left al-Badandūn[538] when they were surrounded by the army commanders (biṭrīq)[539] of Salūqīyah[540] — Qadhaydhīyah, Qurrah, Kawkab, and Kharshanah. The Muslims dismounted and hocked their animals, and in the fighting all of them were slain, save for five or six hundred who laid on the whips to their riding beasts and escaped. The Byzantines killed many and captured ʿAbdallāh b. Rashīd, who was struck down by numerous blows; he was taken to Luʾluʾah and then on to the tyrant,[541] along the post road.

Muḥammad al-Muwallad was made governor of Wāsiṭ this year. Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ, who gathered the taxes of areas adjacent to Wāsiṭ on behalf of the Zanj leader, engaged Muḥammad in battle, defeated him and, after driving him from Wāsiṭ, occupied it.

An Account of [the] Battle [at Wāsiṭ][542]

Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ had been sent by the leader of the Zanj to the districts of al-Ḥawānīt and the marshlands. Following his defeat of Juʿ-

535. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 312.

536. See EI,[2] s.v. "al-ʿAwāṣim"; Le Strange, Lands, 128ff.

537. The force led by ʿAbdallāh took one of the most common routes through the Taurus mountains into Byzantine-controlled territory, the Darb al-Salāmah, or Safety Pass, which went through the famous Cilician Gates. See Le Strange, Lands, 134.

538. See Le Strange, Lands, 133, where he transliterates it Badhandūn. This was the place, near Tarsus, where the Caliph al-Maʾmūn died.

539. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. b-ṭ-r-q; he equates the Byzantine term biṭrīq with qāʾid "commander" in Muslim military ranks.

540. The ancient Seleucia, southwest of Tarsus. See Le Strange, Lands, 133.

541. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 312, uses the more polite expression "king of Rūm."

542. See Popovic, Révolte, 116ff. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 312–15.

lān al-Turkī, the central authorities' tax collector, and his battle against Aghartimish, whose army he routed, and his killing Khushaysh, whose camp he plundered, Sulaymān wrote to the Zanj leader, seeking permission to come and renew his bond with him and put in order various of his own domestic affairs.

After he had sent the letter, Aḥmad b. Mahdī al-Jubbā'ī advised Sulaymān to attack the forces of [Takīn] al-Bukhārī, who at the time was staioned in Bardūdā.[543] Sulaymān agreed and set out for Bardūdā. He arrived at a spot called Akramahr, which was about five [1918] farsakhs[544] from Takīn's army camp.

When he reached the place, al-Jubbā'ī[545] said to Sulaymān that in his opinion Sulaymān should remain [in Akramahr] while he would proceed in the boats to attract the enemy toward him, causing them considerable trouble and effort on the way. He said, "By the time they reach you, they will be exhausted, and you can deal with them as you wish." Sulaymān followed this advice and mustered his cavalry and foot soldiers on the spot, while Aḥmad b. Mahdī set out early in the morning in the galleys. He reached Takīn's camp and fighting broke out for a while as Takīn prepared his own cavalry and infantry. Al-Jubbā'ī fell back from him and despatched a young man to inform Sulaymān that Takīn's troops were approaching him with their cavalry. The messenger found that Sulaymān had already begun to follow after al-Jubbā'ī when news was slow in reaching him. The messenger sent him back to his camp, while another messenger from al-Jubbā'ī arrived with the same information. After Sulaymān returned to his troops, he sent off Tha'lab b. Ḥafṣ al-Baḥrānī and one of the Zanj commanders called Manīnā with a detachment of Zanj. They were to set up an ambush in the countryside along the route that Takīn's cavalry would have to take, and Sulaymān ordered them to attack from the rear once they had passed by. When al-Jubbā'ī learned that Sulaymān had strengthened their position with his horsemen and ordered the setting up of an ambush, in a voice loud

543. See Le Strange, Lands, 41; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 271. The Bardūdā was a canal issuing from the Tigris and flowing into the great swampland (al-baṭīḥah). The reference here could be to the canal or to a place of the same name located on it.

544. About 30 km.

545. Throughout the passage describing these events, Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 313, refers to him as al-Ḥayātī.

enough to allow Takīn's troops to hear, he addressed his own troops saying, "You have deceived me! Destroyed me! I ordered you not to enter this canal,[546] but you insisted. Now you have put us in this position from which I can see no escape." When Takīn's troops heard al-Jubbā'ī's remarks, they eagerly renewed the pursuit, shouting [1919] that they had "a bird[547] in a cage."

Al-Jubbā'ī hastened off, with Takīn's troops following and raining arrows down upon them. They passed by the spot where the ambush was set, approaching Sulaymān's camp where he himself was concealed behind a wall with his horsemen and soldiers. Sulaymān then advanced to meet the enemy army as the ambush emerged behind the cavalry and al-Jubbā'ī turned the fronts of his galleys around [to face] those [of the enemy] who were on the canal. Victory over the enemy was achieved on all fronts. The Zanj pursued them, killing and plundering, for a distance of some three *farsakh*s.[548] Then Sulaymān stopped and said to al-Jubbā'ī, "Let's turn back. We have won easily and are in good shape. Security is preferable to anything else." To which al-Jubbā'ī replied, "On the contrary! Our trick worked well on them and we have made their hearts faint. The best thing now is to take them again by surprise this very night. Perhaps we could drive them out of their camp and scatter them." Sulaymān put al-Jubbā'ī's advice into action and marched toward Takīn's camp, reaching it at sunset. He attacked, and Takīn and his followers responded as a ferocious battle developed. Then Sulaymān and his troops finally withdrew from the fighting. He halted to restore order to his troops and then despatched Shibl with a detachment of horsemen, together with some foot soldiers, into the countryside. He ordered al-Jubbā'ī to sail his galleys along the canal. Sulaymān set off with his cavalry and infantry, leading them himself, and he reached Takīn without obstacle. They, however, withdrew entirely, abandoning their camp. Sulaymān seized as booty all that could be found and then burned the camp. Upon returning to his own camp with all the booty that had been gathered, he found a letter awaiting him from the abominable one granting him permission to return home. Sulay-
[1920] mān left al-Jubbā'ī behind in charge. He took with him the banners found in Takīn's camp, the barges seized from Abū Tamīm, Khu-

546. Literally "entrance" or "mouth," here clearly meaning a canal.
547. Literally bulbul, a nightingale.
548. About 18 km.

shaysh, and Takīn as well and journeyed to the abominable one's base, arriving there in Jumādā I in the year 264 (January 9–February 7, 878).[549]

An Account of How the Abominable One Prepared His Zanj to Occupy Wāsiṭ[550] (and Other Events of the Year 264)[551]

Yaḥyā b. Khalaf[552] al-Jubbā'ī left for Māzrawān in the galleys and with the troops over which Sulaymān had given him charge. This was reportedly after Sulaymān b. Jāmi' had departed from his camp following the battle with Takīn and gone to the leader of the Zanj. Al-Jubbā'ī headed there in search of supplies, together with a group of blacks, but Ju'lān's troops challenged him and seized the boats accompanying him; they routed him and he returned in defeat to Ṭahītha. There he received letters from villagers[553] informing him that when Manjūr, a mawlā of the Commander of the Faithful, and Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥabīb al-Yashkūrī learned of Sulaymān b. Jāmi''s absence from Ṭahītha, they joined forces, assembled their soldiers and set upon the village, killing and burning, and then departed. Those who escaped from the village went to another called al-Ḥajjājiyyah and remained there. [1921]

Al-Jubbā'ī wrote to Sulaymān with the information contained in the villagers' communication and also mentioned his encounter with Ju'lān's troops. The Zanj leader bade Sulaymān to hasten back to Ṭahītha. He arrived there and gave it about that he intended to go into battle against Ju'lān and mustered his army in preparation. Al-Jubbā'ī was sent in advance of Sulaymān with the galleys containing horses and men and with orders to reach Māzrawān and station himself opposite Ju'lān's army. He was instructed to let the horses be exposed to graze where Ju'lān's troops could see them; but (al-Jubbā'ī) was not to attack them.

---

549. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 314, says this event occurred in the year 263.

550. Popovic, Révolte, 118–22.

551. This subheading is not in the form usually employed by Ṭabarī.

552. Manuscripts B and C have this reading, albeit a corrupt one, for al-Jubbā'ī's name was Aḥmad b. Mahdī.

553. These may have been from the village of Marwān, which, as noted on p. 177, above, was near Ṭahīthā.

Sulaymān, for his part, rode out with his entire army, except for a handful that he left behind in his camp, and entered the region of the Ahwār.[554] He at last came upon two such stretches of open water called al-Rabbah and al-'Amraqah. Sulaymān then headed for Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥabīb, who was at that time at a spot called Tallfakhkhār.[555] When he reached him, a major battle broke out. Many were slain and Sulaymān was able to seize a large number of horses and abundant booty. He killed a brother of Muḥammad b. 'Alī, though Muḥammad himself escaped. Sulaymān set out on return journey and when he was in the open countryside between al-Bazzāq and the village,[556] horsemen of the Banū Shaybān appeared. Now Sulaymān had struck down one of the chiefs of the Banū Shaybān in Tallfakhkhār, killing him, taking one of his young sons prisoner, and confiscating the mare he was riding. News of this had reached the tribe, and so now they confronted Sulaymān in the open with four hundred horsemen. At the time Sulaymān had marched against Ibn Ḥabīb, he had sent for his deputy in al-Ṭaff,[557] 'Umayr b. 'Ammār, to act as guide owing to his knowledge of the roads. When Sulaymān [1922] spotted the horsemen of the Banū Shaybān, he sent off all his troops leaving 'Umayr b. 'Ammār on his own. The Banū Shaybān fought and killed him, carrying off his head when they left. The abominable one was greatly distressed at the news of 'Umayr's death. Sulaymān had transported to the abominable one all that had been acquired in the territory of Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥabīb, this occurring at the end of Rajab (March 9–April 7, 878) of this year.

In Sha'bān (April 8–May 6, 878) Sulaymān took a detachment of his troops to Qaryat Ḥassān,[558] where, at the time, one of the central authorities' commanders called Jaysh b. Ḥamartakīn was stationed. Sulaymān attacked the village, causing Jaysh to flee in fear and allowing Sulaymān to capture, plunder, and burn it. He took with him horses [as booty] and returned to his own camp.

Next, on the 10th of Sha'bān (April 17, 878), Sulaymān left for the 554. Ibn Serapion describes a hawr (pl. ahwār) as a great sheet of clear water in which no reeds grow. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 297–98; EI.[1] s.v. "Maisān."

555. The reading is uncertain.

556. The name of the place is not specified, but it may refer to the village of Marwān, as earlier in this passage.

557. A certain area in the district of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 36.

558. A village between Dayr al-'Āqūl and Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 266.

region of al-Ḥawānīt[559] and sent al-Jubbā'ī upstream in the galleys toward Bar(r) Musāwir.[560] There he found a number of large boats, which Ju'lān had wanted to use to reach the Nahr Abān; they contained his horses, with which he used to go out hunting. Al-Jubbā'ī attacked the vessels, killed the crews, and seized the horses, of which there were twelve, and then returned to Ṭahīthā.

On the 26th of Sha'bān (May 3, 878) Sulaymān attacked Tall Rumānā. The inhabitants evacuated the place, and Sulaymān gathered all he could in booty and returned to his camp. Next, on the 10th of Ramaḍān (May 16, 878), he went to al-Jazīrah, where Abbā[561] was at the time, while Ju'lān was in Māzrawān. Sulaymān had written to the abominable one, asking that he send him barges; he provided ten with a man from 'Abbādān in charge called al-Ṣaqr b. al- [1923]
Ḥusayn. When al-Ṣaqr reached Sulaymān with the barges, he pretended to be planning to attack Ju'lān. The news that Sulaymān intended to advance on him soon reached Ju'lān's ears, and thus his main concern was to protect his own camp. But, as Sulaymān approached Abbā's location, he turned aside to Abbā and attacked him, thus taking him by surprise, when he was not expecting him. Sulaymān succeeded in achieving his goal and in acquiring six barges.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said—Jabbāsh the eunuch said that Sulaymān actually found eight barges in [Abbā's] camp, and two of them, which were on the shore, he burned. He seized horses, weapons, and other booty and returned to his own camp.

Sulaymān next made it known that he intended attacking Takīn al-Bukhārī. To this end he equipped some boats with [the assistance of] al-Jubbā'ī and Ja'far b. Aḥmad, a maternal uncle of Ankalay,[562] son of the accursed abominable one. But, when the boats neared Ju'lān's camp, Ju'lān pursued, attacked, and seized possession of them. Sulaymān then launched an assault on Ju'lān from the landward side and drove him to flight toward al-Ruṣāfah.[563] He recovered 559. See Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 46.

560. The reading is very uncertain. See p. 176, above.

561. Popovic, Révolte, 117, queries whether this person might be one of Ju'lān's officers. It is possible, too, that he is same Abbā al-Turkī, who has already been reported as operating in this area. See p. 178, above.

562. Halm, Traditionen, 55, notes that Ankalay is a Persian name, which supports the view that the Zanj leader, 'Alī b. Muḥammad, was of Persian origin.

563. A town lying on the east bank of the Tigris below Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, Lands, 40; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 782.

the boats, as well as twenty-seven horses, two foals of Juʿlān's, and three mules, to say nothing of considerable quantities of other booty and weapons. Once again Sulaymān returned to Ṭahītha.

Muḥammad (b. al-Ḥasan) said that Jabbāsh denied any mention of Takīn in this context; nor did he know anything concerning him from the evidence of (al-Ṣaqr b. al-Ḥusayn) al-ʿAbbādānī but claimed that Sulaymān's only objective was against Juʿlān.[564] In fact, Sulaymān's troops had no information of him until it was rumored that he and al-Jubbāʾī had both been killed, which caused great anxiety among his followers.[565] Then hard news emerged of developments in the fighting against Juʿlān. They calmed down and waited quietly until Sulaymān came to them. Sulaymān wrote to the abominable [1924] one of his exploits and sent him banners and weapons.

In Dhū al-Qaʿdah (July 5 – August 3, 878) Sulaymān went to al-Ruṣāfah and attacked Maṭar b. Jāmiʿ, who was stationed there. He seized much booty, burned and plundered al-Ruṣāfah, and sent banners to the abominable one. On the 5th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 264 (August 8, 878) Sulaymān arrived at the abominable one's city.[566] He stayed to celebrate the feast[567] and remain at home. Maṭar b. Jāmiʿ went and attacked the village of al-Ḥajjājiyyah, taking a number of its inhabitants captive. One of these was Sulaymān's religious judge called Saʿīd b. al-Sayyid al-ʿAdawī, who was captured and sent to Wāsiṭ along with Thaʿlab b. Ḥafṣ (al-Baḥrānī) and four commanders who were with him. They had gone to al-Ḥarjaliyyah, about two and a half *farsakh*s from Ṭahītha, when al-Jubbāʾī set out with horses and men to thwart Maṭar. Al-Jubbāʾī arrived in the district, however, after Maṭar had already committed his acts there, and so al-Jubbāʾī retired and sent the news to Sulaymān, who arrived on Tuesday, the 28th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year (August 31, 878).

---

564. There appears to be some confusion or misunderstanding among the sources Ṭabarī is using here. There is a parallel, however, between Sulaymān's two campaigns against Abbā and Juʿlān, each of which was preceded by the spread of "disinformation" on his real intention. Jabbāsh seems not to have known about the first attack against Abbā, when Sulaymān had pretended to be campaigning against Juʿlān.

565. Apparently Sulaymān had left his main army and was using only the boats and the troops on them in his forays against Abbā and al-Jubbāʾī.

566. That is, al-Mukhtārah.

567. That is, the feast of the sacrifice, the major celebration of the pilgrimage. See EI.[2] s.vv. "Ḥadjdj," "ʿĪd al-Aḍḥā'."

Ju'lān was removed from his post, and Aḥmad b. Laythawayh arrived and stationed himself in al-Shadīdiyyah.[568]

Sulaymān ventured to the Nahr Abān where he discovered one of Ibn Laythawayh's commanders called Ṭurnāj,[569] whom he attacked and killed.

Muḥammad (b. al-Ḥasan) — Jabbāsh said that the one killed at that place was Bīnak; and, as for Ṭurnāj, he was slain in Māzrawān.

Next Sulaymān reached al-Ruṣāfah, where the army of Maṭar b. Jāmi' was then located. Sulaymān attacked and plundered his camp, capturing from it seven barges, two of which he burned. That was in [1925] the month of Rabī' II (December 11, 877–January 8, 878) of the year 264.[570]

Muḥammad — Jabbāsh said that six barges were seized and that this conflict was at al-Shadīdiyyah.

Following this, Sulaymān ventured forth with five barges aboard which he had arrayed the very finest of his commanders and troops. Takīn al-Bukhārī engaged him in battle in al-Shadīdiyyah, as Ibn Laythawayh had by then already proceeded to the district of al-Kūfah and Junbulā'. Takīn vanquished Sulaymān, seizing his barges with their war machines, weapons, and fighters. In this encounter the most experienced of Sulaymān's commanders were slain. Ibn Laythawayh afterward marched to al-Shadīdiyyah and administered these districts until Abū Aḥmad appointed Muḥammad al-Muwallad governor of Wāsiṭ.[571]

Muḥammad — Jabbāsh said that, when Ibn Laythawayh arrived in al-Shadīdiyyah, Sulaymān marched upon him and for two days they fought against each other. Finally, on the third day Sulaymān fell back and Ibn Laythawayh and his followers rushed to pursue him. Then Sulaymān returned to the attack and threw Ibn Laythawayh into the mouth of the Bardūdā canal; he saved himself after nearly drowning. Sulaymān captured seventeen of his riding animals.

---

568. Ju'lān had been prefect of Wāsiṭ and was replaced by Aḥmad b. Laythawayh.

569. The reading is uncertain.

570. Unless Sulaymān attacked al-Ruṣāfah twice in the same year, this account is out of place in the chronological ordering of events. Ṭabarī has already reported, p. 196, above, Sulaymān's defeat of Maṭar b. Jāmi' in al-Ruṣāfah in Dhū al-Qa'dah, toward the end of the year.

571. That is, replacing Aḥmad Ibn Laythawayh, who had held the post. See Popovic, Révolte, 117.

[Muḥammad] continued, saying that Sulaymān communicated with the abominable one requesting reinforcements. The Zanj leader despatched al-Khalīl b. Abān and al-Mudhawwab[572] to him with about fifteen hundred horsemen. Upon the arrival of these reinforcements, Sulaymān straightaway went to engage Muḥammad al-Muwallad in battle. In the course of it Muḥammad fled and the Zanj occupied Wāsiṭ. A large number of persons were killed and the city was pillaged and burned. Kanjūr al-Bukhārī was in Wāsiṭ at the time and he held on, putting up a defense throughout that day until the afternoon, when he was killed. The ones who led the horsemen [1926] in Sulaymān's army that day were al-Khalīl b. Abān and 'Abdallāh, who was known as al-Mudhawwab. Al-Jubbā'ī was in charge of the galleys; al-Zanjī b. Mihrān was in charge of the barges. Sulaymān b. Jāmi' led his black commanders and their infantry; Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Sha'rānī and his two brothers led his horses and foot soldiers along with Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. The entire force performed to perfection.[573]

Sulaymān b. Jāmi' later left Wāsiṭ and with his entire army headed for Junbulā', causing despoliation and destruction. Discord broke out between him and al-Khalīl b. Abān who wrote to his brother 'Alī about it. 'Alī b. Abān begged the Zanj leader to relieve al-Khalīl of his duties with Sulaymān, and permission was given for al-Khalīl to return to the abominable one's city with 'Alī b. Abān's associates and slaves. Al-Mudhawwab remained behind with Sulaymān in charge of the Arab tribesmen. Sulaymān stayed in his camp for some days and then moved to the Nahr al-Amīr where he reestablished his camp. He despatched al-Jubbā'ī and al-Mudhawwab to Junbulā', where they remained for ninety days while Sulaymān was encamped at the Nahr al-Amīr.

Muḥammad—Jabbāsh said that Sulaymān's camp was in al-Shadīdiyyah.

In this year Sulaymān b. Wahb departed from Baghdad for Sāmarrā. He was accompanied by al-Ḥasan b. Wahb, while Aḥmad b. al-Muwaffaq, Masrūr al-Balkhī, and the army commanders escorted them in public procession. When Sulaymān reached Sāmarrā, al-Mu'tamid grew angry with him and imprisoned him, bound in fetters. His palace and those of his sons Wahb and Ibrāhīm were confiscated.

572. Ṭabarī enlightens us a few lines below. This man's name was 'Abdallāh, his nickname al-Mudhawwab, literally "melted (fat)."

573. Literally "as one hand."

Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad was made vizier on the 27th of Dhū al-Qa'dah (July 31, 878).[574] [1927]

[Abū Aḥmad] al-Muwaffaq left Baghdad with 'Abdallāh b. Sulaymān.[575] As he approached Sāmarrā, al-Mu'tamid transferred to the west bank [of the Tigris] and assembled his camp there, while Abū Aḥmad and his entourage settled on the island of al-Mu'ayyad. Messengers went back and forth[576] between the two. A few days after the beginning of Dhū al-Ḥijjah al-Mu'tamid boarded a fire boat[577] on the Tigris, as his brother Abū Aḥmad headed toward him in a light rivercraft. Then the Caliph bestowed robes of honor upon Abū Aḥmad, Masrūr al-Balkhī, Kayghalagh, and Aḥmad b. Mūsā b. Bughā. On Tuesday, the 8th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, which was yawm al-tarwiyah[578] (August 11, 878), Abū Aḥmad's troops crossed over the river to al-Mu'tamid's camp.

Sulaymān b. Wahb was released from prison, and al-Mu'tamid returned to the Jawsaq palace. Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad fled with Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Shirzād, and instructions were given for the confiscation of their property and that of their supporters.[579] Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh was imprisoned. The army commanders stationed in Sāmarrā fled to Takrīt.[580] Abū Mūsā b. al-Mutawakkil went into hiding but reappeared thereafter. Those commanders who had gone to Takrīt went farther on, to Mosul, and began to help themselves to the tax revenues.

This year the pilgrimage was led by Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā al-Hāshimī al-Kūfī.

---

574. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 315–26, for details.

575. Manuscript C and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 316, both have 'Ubaydallāh b. Sulaymān b. Wahb.

576. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 316, reproduces this passage from Ṭabarī almost verbatim, though with certain shifts in the order of sentences. He glosses this sentence, stating that al-Mu'tamid was angry with al-Muwaffaq, and then an agreement was reached.

577. Ḥarrāqah. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. ḥ-r-q.

578. Literally "day of providing oneself with water" the 8th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, during the annual pilgrimage ceremonies. See EI[2] s.v. "Ḥadjdj."

579. Al-Ḥasan b. Makhlad and Sulaymān b. Wahb were bitter rivals. See Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 309–15.

580. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 316, where he explains that the commanders fled in fear of al-Muwaffaq.

The Events of the Year 265

(SEPTEMBER 3, 878–AUGUST 22, 879)

Among the events taking place during this year was a battle in the district of Junbulā'[581] between Aḥmad b. Laythawayh and Sulaymān b. Jāmi', the Zanj master's commander.

[1928] An Account of [the] Battle [of Junbulā'][582]

Sulaymān b. Jāmi' had reportedly written to the Zanj leader, informing him of the situation on Nahr al-Zuhayrī. He requested permission for expenses to dig a canal from it into the Sawād al-Kūfah and the plain.[583] Sulaymān informed him the distance was not great and that once the canal was dug it would be easy for the Zanj leader [to arrange] shipments of food supplies from the districts of Junbulā' and the Sawād al-Kūfah. The abominable one sent him a man called Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Baṣrī to help in carrying out the task. He wrote to Sulaymān to supply all his needs in terms of expenses and lodging with him and his army until the task for which he had been sent was completed. Sulaymān moved his entire force to stay in al-Sharīṭiyyah[584] for almost a month and set the laborers to work on the canal. During this time Sulaymān did not touch [the provisions] at hand belonging to the villagers from nearby Khusrū Sābūr.[585] Rather, supplies reached him from the district of al-Ṣīn[586] and adjacent areas, until the moment when Ibn Laythawayh, Abū Aḥmad's financial administrator over Junbulā', attacked Sulaymān and killed fourteen[587] of his commanders.

581. A hamlet between Wāsiṭ and al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 126.

582. See Popovic, Révolte, 118; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 322.

583. Reading al-barāz, according to Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, DCCXCII, rather than al-barār, as in the text.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said that forty-seven commanders had been killed and untold numbers of others. Sulaymān's camp was pillaged and his boats, which were moored in this canal that he was engaged in digging, were burned. Sulaymān withdrew in utter defeat to Ṭahītha, where he remained. Al-Jubbā'ī arrived in the wake of the defeat and later went back upstream to stay in Barratimurtā,[588] leaving a boat master called al-Zanjī b. Mihrān in charge of the barges.

The central authorities had sent [Abū Ḥamzah] Nuṣayr to have [1929]
Shāmraj[589] sent in bonds to the court and appointed him to Shāmraj's duties. After this, Nuṣayr came upon al-Zanjī b. Mihrān on the Barratimurtā canal and seized nine of his barges, six of which al-Zanjī was able to recover.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan said that Jabbāsh denied that al-Zanjī b. Mihrān had recovered any of the barges, claiming that Nuṣayr got away with them all.

Al-Zanjī headed for Ṭahītha, forwarding a letter to Sulaymān before he arrived. Sulaymān stayed in Ṭahītha until news reached him that al-Muwaffaq was coming his way.

In al-Muḥarram of this year [September 3–October 2, 878] Aḥmad b. Ṭulūn[590] fought against Sīmā the Tall in Antioch,[591] besieging him until he conquered the city and killed Sīmā.

---

584. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 322, calls the place al-Sharīṭah.

585. Well-known village near Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 96.

586. A location in the region of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 440.

587. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 322, has forty.

588. The reading is uncertain.

589. This person remains unidentified.

590. Ṭabarī, III, 1697, notes that in the year 254/868 Bāyakbāk appointed him governor of Egypt. See EI,² s.v. "Aḥmad b. Ṭulūn."

591. Le Strange, Lands, 152 n. 2, calls attention to the confusion, in the early Ara-

Al-Qāsim b. Mimāh[592] assaulted Dulaf b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf[593] in Iṣfahān and killed him. Later a group of Dulaf's companions killed al-Qāsim in revenge and declared Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz their chief.

In al-Muḥarram of this year (September 3 – October 2, 878) Muḥammad al-Muwallad joined Ya'qūb b. al-Layth. The central authorities ordered the confiscation of his money and lands.

In Jumādā I of this year (December 30, 878–January 28, 879) Arab tribesmen killed Ju'lān the ruffian (al-'ayyār) in Dimimmā.[594] He had been providing protection for a caravan when he was killed. The central authorities despatched a group of mawlās to seek out the [1930] perpetrators of the crime, but they fled. The searchers got as far as 'Ayn al-Tamr[595] and then returned to Baghdad, a number of them having died of the gripping cold that lasted for some days, with snow even falling in Baghdad.

Abū Aḥmad ordered the imprisonment in his palace of Sulaymān and his son 'Ubaydallāh,[596] along with a number of their relations. The palaces of some of these latter were plundered, but a guard was ordered to protect the palaces of Sulaymān and his son. Their estates and wealth, along with the wealth and estates of their relatives, with the exception of Aḥmad b. Sulaymān, were confiscated. A settlement was later arranged with Sulaymān and his son 'Abdallāh for the sum of nine hundred thousand dinars, and they were moved to a location where anyone they wished could come to visit.

This same year as well witnessed the assembly of troops of Mūsā b. Utāmish, Isḥāq b. Kundājīq, Yanghajūr b. Urkhūz, and al-Faḍl b. Mūsā b. Bughā at the Shammāsiyyah Gate. They crossed over the [main] Baghdad bridge[597] and ventured to al-Safīnatayn, followed by bic chronicles, between Antioch in Syria and other places of the same name in Asia Minor—e.g., Antioch of Pisidia. Here the locale intended is Antioch in Syria, the ancient Antiocheia; this is confirmed on p. 204, below, and by the report in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 324, that, when Ibn Ṭulūn left Egypt for Syria in this year he appointed his son 'Abbās his deputy. See EI,² s.v. "Anṭākiya."

---

592. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 327, calls him al-Qāsim b. Mahāh.

593. In 254/868 his father had sent him to Junday Sābūr and Tustar to collect taxes. See Ṭabarī, III, 1697.

594. A village on the Euphrates just below al-Anbār. See Le Strange, Lands, 66; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 69.

595. The district of 'Ayn al-Tamr lay west of the Euphrates; the fortified town itself was situated just south of Hīt. See Le Strange, Lands, 65, 81.

596. The text has incorrect 'Abdallāh; see Sourdel, Vizirat, I, 311.

597. See n. 21, above.

Aḥmad b. al-Muwaffaq.[598] They did not return but encamped at Ṣarṣar.[599]

On the 17th of Jumādā II (February 14, 879) Abū Aḥmad appointed Sa'īd b. Makhlad as his secretary. After having bestowed upon him a robe of honor, Sa'īd traveled to the commanders in Ṣarṣar. Abū Aḥmad next sent his son Aḥmad to them. He discussed matters with them, and they returned together, after which robes of honor were bestowed upon them.

According to report, five of the Byzantine commanders, with thirty thousand troops, marched toward Adhanah.[600] Having reached the oratory,[601] they captured Urkhūz, who had been the governor of the frontier districts, then removed from his post, but had [1931] stayed on as part of the frontier guard. Some four hundred men were captured with him, and the Byzantines killed some fourteen hundred men who had rallied to them. The Byzantines withdrew after four days; this was in Jumādā I (January 2, 879) of this year.

In Rajab (February 27 – March 28, 879) of this year Mūsā b. Utāmish, Isḥāq b. Kundājīq, and Yanghajūr b. Urkhūz assembled troops on Nahr Dayālā.[602]

In this same year Aḥmad b. 'Abdallāh al-Khujustānī conquered Naysābūr. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ṭāhir, Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir's prefect, went to Marv and settled there. The brother of Sharkab al-Jammāl was between al-Ḥusayn and al-Khujustānī.

Ṭūs was devastated this year.

Ismā'īl b. Bulbul was appointed vizier.[603]

Ya'qūb b. al-Layth died this year[604] in al-Ahwāz and was succeeded by his brother 'Amr b. al-Layth, who wrote to the central authorities to his obedience and loyalty. Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh was 598. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 326, who reproduces this passage with glosses, says that al-Muwaffaq prevented the return of the soldiers.

599. A town on the Ṣarṣar canal, reached by way of the southern road leading to al-Kūfah from Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 32.

600. The modern Adana. See Le Strange, Lands, 128, 130–31. It was one of the line of fortresses (al-thughūr) protecting Syria and was situated near the northern coast of the bay of Alexandretta; EI,[2] s.vv. "Adana," "al-'Awāṣim."

601. Al-muṣallā.

602. Having moved from their camp in Ṣarṣar (see p. 174, above) to the eastern bank of the Tigris, to the canal that irrigated the gardens of east Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 59 (vocalized Diyālā).

603. See Sourdel, Vizirat, 315–16.

604. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 325, for additional details.

despatched to him in Dhū al-Qa'dah (June 25–July 24, 879) of this year.

A group of tribesmen of the Banū Asad this year killed 'Alī b. Masrūr al-Balkhī on the Mecca Road before he arrived at al-Mughīthah. Abū Aḥmad had appointed Muḥammad b. Masrūr al-Balkhī governor of the Mecca Road, and it was he who appointed his brother 'Alī b. Masrūr to the post.

The Byzantine emperor sent 'Abdallāh b. Rashīd b. Kāwus, the tax collector of the frontier districts who had been captured by him, to Aḥmad b. Ṭulūn, along with many other Muslim prisoners. The emperor also sent him a number of manuscripts as a gift.

[1932] A detachment of Zanj went to Jabbul[605] in thirty galleys, seized four boats containing foodstuffs, and then returned.

Al-'Abbās b. Aḥmad b. Ṭulūn and his followers took themselves off to Barqah,[606] in defiance of his father, Aḥmad who, according to report, had left him in charge of his administrative duties in Egypt when he departed for Syria. Upon Aḥmad's return from Syria to Egypt, Al-'Abbās took what money there was in the Egyptian treasury, as well as furnishings and other things belonging to his father, and left for Barqah.[607] Aḥmad despatched a force against him, which captured and brought al-'Abbās back. Aḥmad imprisoned him in his own quarters. Because of this action of al-'Abbās, a group of men who had joined up with him in this venture were killed.[608]

The Zanj this year occupied al-Nu'māniyyah,[609] burned its market and most of the inhabitants' dwellings, and took prisoners. They next moved to Jarjarāyā,[610] causing people of the Sawād region to enter Baghdad.[611]

---

605. See Le Strange, Lands, 38. It lay on the eastern bank of the Tigris, about 50 km. below Jarjarāyā; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 23; Popovic, Révolte, 119.

606. For further details, see Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 324–25; EI,² s.v. "Barḳa." The town and region attached to it were the classical Cyrenaica.

607. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 324, gives the date of his arrival in the month of Rabī' I, 265 (January 11–30, 878).

608. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 325, where it is stated that al-'Abbās was still in prison in the year 268/881–82.

609. A town on the western bank of the Tigris about halfway between Baghdad and Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, Lands, 37; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 322.

610. A town below Dayr al-'Aqūl, which lay on both banks of the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 37; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 54.

611. This marked the northernmost point of the Zanj expansion, the closest to Baghdad that their campaigns brought them.

During the course of this year Abū Aḥmad made ʿAmr b. al-Layth governor of Khurāsān, Fārs, Iṣfahān, Sijistān, Kirmān, and al-Sind,[612] and had the formal investiture declared in the presence of witnesses. Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh was sent to ʿAmr with the document of his investiture, together with a contract and robe of honor.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 25–August 22, 879) of this year Masrūr al-Balkhī marched on al-Nīl,[613] and ʿAbdallāh b. Laythawayh withdrew from it with his brother's troops. ʿAbdallāh had been in open conflict with the central authorities and had gone with his followers to Aḥmadābādh. He was pursued by Masrūr al-Balkhī, who intended to engage him in battle. Then ʿAbdallāh b. Laythawayh and his followers unexpectedly came to Masrūr on foot and yielded to him in obedience and loyalty. ʿAbdallāh b. Laythawayh, with his sword and girdle hung about his neck, proferred his apologies to Masrūr and swore an oath that he had been incited to do what he did. His apology was accepted, and robes of honor were ordered bestowed upon him and several of his commanders. [1933]

Takīn al-Bukhārī ventured forth to al-Ahwāz as vanguard for Masrūr al-Balkhī.

An Account of Takīn's Arrival in al-Ahwāz[614]

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, Masrūr al-Balkhī appointed Takīn al-Bukhārī governor of the districts of al-Ahwāz at the time Abū Aḥmad had appointed Masrūr over them.[615] Takīn set out and arrived at al-Ahwāz. ʿAlī b. Abān had already reached there and was on his way to Tustar, which he surrounded with a large force of his Zanj troops and others. The populace was terrified at the development and was about to surrender the city when, in this situation, Takīn arrived. He had not even had time to change from his travel attire when he went into battle against ʿAlī b. Abān and his troops. Defeat was the lot of the Zanj, as they were slain, routed, and scat-612. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 326, adds to these posts that of commandant of police in Baghdad.

613. A town on Nahr al-Nīl, which was a continuation, of the Great Ṣarāt canal west of the town; it flowed from the Euphrates to the Tigris below Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 73; Le Strange, "Ibn Serapion's Description," 261.

614. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 323.

615. See Popovic, Révolte, 119.

tered. 'Alī was forced to retreat with the remnants of his shattered forces. This was the famous battle of Bāb Kūdak[616] [at Tustar], after which Takīn al-Bukhārī returned and settled in the city. Many freebooters (ṣa'ālīk) and others swelled his forces. 'Alī b. Abān also set out for Tustar with a sizable collection of his troops and encamped on the eastern side of the Masruqān canal. He placed his brother on the western side, together with a troop of horse and Zanj infantry. He sent on ahead a number of the Zanj commanders, among them An-[1934] kluwayh and Ḥusayn al-Ḥammāmī and others, and ordered them to station themselves at the Fārs bridge (qanṭarah). Information about 'Alī b. Abān's arrangements reached Takīn by means of a slave called Waṣīf al-Rūmī, who was a fugitive from 'Alī b. Abān's army. He reported on the enemy's position at the Fārs bridge, on their indulgence in wine drinking, and on the dispersal of their troops to gather food. So during the night Takīn made his way toward them with a detachment of troops and attacked, killing from among their commanders Ankalwayh, Ḥusayn al-Ḥammāmī, Abū Ṣāliḥ Mufarraj, and Andarūn. The rest fled and caught up with al-Khalīl b. Abān, telling him what had happened to them. Takīn then ventured along the eastern side of the Masruqān and eventually found 'Alī b. Abān with a detachment of troops. But 'Alī did not pause to fight and withdrew, although a slave called Ja'farawayh from 'Alī's cavalry was taken captive. 'Alī and al-Khalīl returned with their detachments to al-Ahwāz, while Takīn went back to Tustar. 'Alī wrote to Takīn to request he refrain from killing Ja'farawayh, and so he was imprisoned. There then occurred an exchange of messages and courtesies between 'Alī and Takīn, news of which reached Masrūr, who thoroughly disapproved. Masrūr even heard that Takīn had besmirched his loyalty by going over to 'Alī b. Abān.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. Dīnār—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī al-Ma'mūnī al-Bādhghīsī, who was one of the associates of Takīn al-Bukhārī, said that when Masrūr [1935] heard the news of Takīn's audacious behavior against him, he paused until he learned the true state of affairs and then set out toward the districts of al-Ahwāz, making a show of his pleasure with and approval of Takīn. He took the road to Shābarzān[617] and

616. The reading is very uncertain, Manuscript B having k-d-d, C m-r-dh-k, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, VII, 323, Kūrak.

617. The reading is uncertain.

thence to al-Sūs. Takīn already knew what Masrūr had heard about him, and this distressed him very much, as well as the group of his commanders who had followed in Masrūr's company. Messages went back and forth between Masrūr and Takīn until Takīn felt safe and secure. Masrūr went to Wādī Tustar, where he sent for Takīn, who crossed over to greet Masrūr. Masrūr ordered that his sword be removed and that he be placed in custody. When Takīn's army saw that, they immediately dispersed, a section of them making for the territory of the Zanj leader, another section joining the Kurd Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh. When Masrūr heard of this [reaction], he extended a safe-conduct to all who remained of Takīn's army, and they joined him.

Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan al-Maʾmūnī said, "I was among those who went to Masrūr's camp when he handed Takīn over to Ibrāhīm b. Juʿlān. Takīn remained in his custody until his appointed time arrived and he died." Some of the affair of Masrūr and Takīn that we have mentioned occurred in the year 265 (878–79) and some in the year 266 (879–80).

The pilgrimage this year was led by Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. ʿĪsā al-Hāshimī.

In this year as well, a detachment of Zanj under Abū al-Mughīrah [1936]
b. ʿĪsā b. Muḥammad al-Makhzūmī attacked Mecca.[618]

618. See Popovic, Révolte, 120, who queries whether Ṭabarī intends "attack," rather than "conquer," which is what the Arabic word mutaghalliban suggests.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXXVII

The 'Abbāsid Recovery

TRANSLATED BY PHILIP M. FIELDS

The Events of the Year 266

(AUGUST, 23, 879–AUGUST 11, 880)

In Ṣafar (September 22–October 20, 879), 'Amr b. al-Layth appointed 'Ubaydallāh b.'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir as his deputy in charge of security (shurṭah) at Baghdad and Sāmarrā, and invested him with robes of honor. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh then returned to his residence, where 'Amr b. al-Layth invested him with robes of honor and had a bar of gold consigned to him.

In Ṣafar, (September 22–October 20, 879), Asātakīn seized al-Rayy and ousted Ṭalmajūr the governor of the city. Then he and his son Adhkūtakīn went to Qazwīn, whose governor was Abrūn, the brother of Kayghalagh. After negotiating peace with Abrūn, the two entered the city, seized Muḥammad b. al-Faḍl b. Sinān al-'Ijlī, his clients and his estates. Asātakīn killed him and then returned to al-Rayy. Its inhabitants fought against him, but he overcame them and entered the city.

A detachment of Byzantines arrived in the Tall Basmā of [1937]
Diyār Rabī'ah,[1] killing or capturing about two hundred fifty

1. Not to be confused with the place of that name situated in the region of Shabakhtān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 864.

Muslims. The people of Naṣībīn[2] and Mosul fled, and the Byzantines withdrew.

In Rabi' II (July 4–August 2, 879), while in Jundīsābūr, on his way back to Baghdad from the camp of 'Amr b. al-Layth, Abū al-Sāj died. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir[3] died before him in the month of al-Muḥarram (August 23–September 21, 879).

'Amr b. al-Layth appointed Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf governor of Iṣbahān. Muḥammad, the son of Abū al-Sāj, was appointed governor of the Ḥaramayn[4] and the road to Mecca.

Aghartmish was appointed governor for the districts of al-Ahwāz which had been under Takīn al-Bukhārī. He arrived there in the month of Ramaḍān (April 15–May 14, 880).

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported that Masrūr ordered Aghartmish, Abbā and Maṭar b. Jāmi' to fight 'Alī b. Abān. They marched until they reached Tustar, where they halted and seized those men who had been in Takīn's prison, among them Ja'farawayh and a group of followers of the leader of the Zanj. All of them were killed; it was Maṭar b. Jāmi' who was responsible. They marched on and arrived in 'Askar Mukram.[5]

Meanwhile, 'Alī b. Abān set out against them sending forward his brother al-Khalīl with the vanguard of his troops. Al-Khalīl moved forward and occupied positions in front of them, while 'Alī followed. As the Zanj outnumbered the government forces, the latter cut the pontoon bridge (from its moorings) and abstained from fighting. In the dark of night, 'Alī b. Abān and his troops withdrew to al-Ahwāz, and al-Khalīl with his men remained in Masruqān. News now reached al-Khalīl that Aghartmish, Abbā and Maṭar b. Jāmi' were approaching and had landed on the eastern side of the Arbuk Bridge (qanṭarah),[6]

---

2. See Le Strange, Lands, 95.

3. He had been governor of Ṭabaristān and deputy of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir in the reign of al-Musta'īn. In 255 (868-869) he was appointed chief of police of Baghdad and the surrounding areas. See Ṭabarī, III/3, 1524, 1706.

4. That is the two holy cities Mecca and al-Madīnah. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥaramayn.

5. 'Askar Mukram was on the route from Baghdad to Tustar. See Le Strange, Lands, 246, 247, and index, 494.

6. This was a vaulted structure built of either brick or stone. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 187.

intending to cross over and reach him. Al-Khalīl reported this [1938] to his brother 'Alī b. Abān, whereupon 'Alī set out for them and encountered them at the bridge. He then sent an order for al-Khalīl to come and join him. This he did. Those of 'Alī's troops who were left in al-Ahwāz became terror-stricken and dismantled his camp, retreating to Nahr al-Sidrah.[7] The battle between 'Alī and the government commanders took place with the government forces carrying the day. The latter abstained from further fighting, and 'Alī returned to al-Ahwāz where, however, he found none of his men. Having discovered that they had reached Nahr al-Sidrah in good order he sent someone to retrieve them, but, since this was difficult, 'Alī himself followed them and remained in Nahr al-Sidrah. The government forces then stationed themselves at 'Askar Mukram.

'Alī b. Abān made preparations to resume fighting and summoned Bahbūdh b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb who arrived with his troops. When Aghartmish and his men heard about the forces 'Alī was bringing to bear against him, he and his army took the field against 'Alī. The latter put his brother, al-Khalīl b. Abān, in command of his vanguard and assigned to him Bahbūdh and Aḥmad b. al-Zaranjī. The two parties came upon each other at Dawlāb,[8] whereupon, 'Alī instructed al-Khalīl b. Abān to position Bahbūdh in ambush. Al-Khalīl marched until he engaged the enemy, and the battle flared between them. During the early part of the day the government forces were successful, but while manoeuvering on the battlefield they were attacked by the ambushers. The Zanj humbled the government forces, causing them to flee and Maṭar b. Jāmi' was taken prisoner; having fallen from his horse, he was seized by Bahbūdh and brought to 'Alī. Sīmā, known as Ṣaghrāj, was killed with a group of officers. When brought before 'Alī by Bahbūdh, Maṭar begged him to spare his life, but 'Alī refused saying, "Had you spared the life of Ja'farawayh, I would indeed spare yours." Then he ordered that Maṭar be brought near him, and he beheaded him with his own hand. 'Alī b. Abān now entered al- [1939]

7. See Le Strange, Lands, 237.
8. Presumably the waterwheel (dawlab) of al-Ahwāz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 622.

Ahwāz, and Aghartmish and Abbā retreated with those men who had escaped with them until they reached Tustar. 'Alī sent the heads (of the enemy) to the abominable one (that is, the leader of the Zanj) who ordered them displayed on the walls of his city.

Muḥammad b. al-Hasan reported: 'Alī b Abān used to attack Aghartmish and his forces with mixed success. Then the abominable one sent most of his contingents to the assistance of 'Alī b. Abān. As a result, the Zanj outnumbered the troops of Aghartmish, who was now forced to reconcile his differences with the enemy. Since 'Alī b. Abān also wished for the same, they concluded a truce. 'Alī b. Abān now started to attack the surrounding areas. One of his attacks brought him to the village known as Bayrūdh,[9] which he subdued, taking much booty. He wrote to al-Khabīth accounting for his actions, sent him the booty which he had acquired, and established himself in Bayrūdh.

In this year, Isḥāq b. Kundājīq deserted the camp of Aḥmad b. Mūsā b. Bughā because the latter, arriving in the Jazīrah, had appointed Mūsā b. Utāmish governor of Diyār Rabī'ah. This displeased Isḥāq b. Kundājīq, who left his camp and went to Balad,[10] where he attacked the Jacobite Kurds.[11] He routed them and seized their property and, as a result, greatly increased his strength. Thereupon he encountered the son of Musāwir al-Shārī and killed him.

In Shawwāl (May 15–June 12, 880), the people of Homs killed their governor 'Isā al-Karkhī.[12]

In this year, Lu'lu', the page (ghulām) of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, took Mūsā b. Utāmish prisoner. The former was staying in the hill country of the Banū Tamīm, while Mūsā b. Utāmish was at Ra's al-'Ayn.[13] One night, while intoxicated, Mūsā set out to 9. Bayrūdh was situated between al-Ahwāz and al-Ṭīb. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 786.

10. Balad was a large settlement situated where the old Persian town Shahrābādh had been located. See Le Strange, Lands, 99, 125.

11. See Ṭabarī III/3, 1859.

12. So named because he had been governor of Karkh Sāmarrā during the reign of al-Muhtadī. See Ṭabarī, III/3, 1797.

13. A walled town famous for its gardens and parks on the banks of the Khabūr, a tributary of the Euphrates. See Le Strange, Lands, 95 ff.

attack Lu'lu''s forces by surprise, but they were lying in ambush. They captured him and delivered him to al-Raqqah. [1940]

In Shawwāl, Lu'lu' encountered Aḥmad b. Mūsā with his commander and their tribal levies. Lu'lu' was routed, and a great many of his troops were killed. Ibn Ṣafwān al-'Uqaylī[14] and the tribesmen made for Aḥmad b. Mūsā's camp to loot the baggage, but Lu'lu''s troops returned to humble them in battle. Those who escaped the rout reached Qarqīsiyyā, and subsequently, in Dhū al-Qa'dah (June 3-July 2, 880), they reached Baghdad and Sāmarrā. Ibn Ṣafwān fled into the desert.

In Shawwāl a battle took place between Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf and Buktimur. Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz routed Buktimur and the latter went to Baghdad.

Al-Khujustānī attacked al-Ḥasan b. Zayd in Jurjān, taking him by surprise. Al-Ḥasan fled, reaching Āmul, while al-Khujustānī seized Jurjān and some of the districts of Ṭabaristān. This took place in Jumādā II and Rajab 266 (January 18–March 16, 880).

Al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥasan al-Aṣghar al-'Uqayqī[15] summoned the people of Ṭabaristān to pledge allegiance to him because al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, before departing to Jurjān, had left him as his deputy in Sāriyyah.[16] After al-Khujustānī's attack on al-Ḥasan in Jurjān, and the flight of al-Ḥasan from there, al-'Uqayqī announced in Sāriyyah that al-Ḥasan had been captured, and he called upon his followers to give their allegiance to him. Some people subsequently took the oath of allegiance to him; however, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd returned and fought against him. Then al-Ḥasan employed a ruse which allowed him to overpower al-'Uqayqī, whom he then killed. Al-Khujustānī looted the property of the merchants of [1941] Jurjān and set fire to the city.

A battle between al-Khujustānī and 'Amr b. al-Layth took place. The former gained the upper hand and routed 'Amr. Entering Naysābūr, he ousted 'Amr's governor and killed a number of those who had sympathized with 'Amr.

14. Al-'Uqaylī was Abū Aḥmad's governor of Qarqīsiyyā. His father, who had been governor of Diyār Muḍar, died in prison at Sāmarrā in 253 (867-868). See Ṭabarī above, 2029, 2149; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VII, 395 ff.

15. Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, XI, 39: al-'Uqaylī.

16. See Le Strange, Lands, 370, 375.

In al-Madīnah and the surrounding areas hostilities broke out between Ja'farids and 'Alīds.

The Cause of These Hostilities

According to reports, in this year Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. Yūsuf al-Ja'farī was the guardian of al-Madīnah, and of the Wādī al-Qurā and surrounding areas.[17] He sent an agent ('āmil) to the Wādī al-Qurā, but the populace rebelled against the Ja'farid's agent, killing him along with two of Isḥāq's brothers. Isḥāq then went to the Wādī al-Qurā, but fell sick there and died. His brother Mūsā b. Muḥammad took over his office in al-Madīnah. Al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā b. Ja'far rebelled against him, but the latter was bought off with eight hundred dīnārs. Following this, Abū al-Qāsim Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl b. al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, the son of the maternal uncle of al-Ḥasan b. Zayd, the governor of Ṭabaristān, staged a revolt. He killed Mūsā, gained control of al-Madīnah, and occupied the city.

At this time prices in the city rose steeply. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad went to the customs and lifted the duties on goods guaranteeing the merchants their money. Prices subsequently declined and the city became calm. The central authorties appointed the Ḥasanid governor of al-Madīnah until Ibn Abī al-Sāj arrived.

In this year, the tribesmen seized the carpet covering the Ka'bah[18] and carried it off. Some of them went to the leader of the Zanj. This calamity shocked the pilgrims in the city.

[1942] In this year, the Byzantines invaded Diyār Rabī'ah. The population was summoned to take to the field, but they set out at a time when the cold weather made it impossible for them to enter the mountain passes.

In this year, Sīmā, Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn's deputy, and three hundred men from Ṭarsūs raided the Syrian border region. In the area of Hirqlah[19] they were met by the enemy—about four thousand men—and they fought a fierce battle. The Muslims inflicted heavy losses upon the enemy, but they themselves also sustained numerous casualties.

17. On his family connection with the government see Ṭabarī, III/3, 1358 ff.
18. See *EI*², s.v. al-Kiswah.

In this year, a battle took place between Isḥaq b. Kundājīq and Isḥāq b. Ayyūb.[20] Ibn Kundājīq defeated Isḥāq b. Ayyūb, forcing him to set up his defenses at Naṣībīn. The victor seized everything in Ibn Ayyūb's camp and killed a great many of his men. Pursuing Ibn Ayyūb, Isḥāq b. Kundājīq reached Naṣībīn and entered the city. The former fled and appealed for help to 'Isā b. al-Shaykh, who was in Āmid,[21] and Abū al-Maghrā' b. Mūsā b. Zurārah, who was in Arzan.[22] They joined forces against Ibn Kundājīq, but then the central authorities sent Yūsuf b. Ya'qūb to Ibn Kundājīq with the governor's insignias for Mosul, Diyār Rabī'ah and Armenia. Yūsuf bestowed the robes of honor on Ibn Kundājīq, whereupon the rebels sued for peace, paying him a sum of two hundred thousand dīnārs so that he might recognize their local authority.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj arrived in Mecca. Ibn al-Makhzūmī offered resistance, but Ibn Abī al-Sāj routed him and seized all his possessions on Tarwiyyah Day.[23]

In this year, Kayghalagh departed for al-Jabal, and Buktimur returned to Dīnawar.

In this year, the troops of the Zanj commander entered Rāmhurmuz.[24]

---

19. This city had been strongly fortified by Hārūn al-Rashīd, presumably because of his interest in a full-scale offensive against the Byzantines. It was turned into a station on the line uniting the border fortresses of the region. See Le Strange, Lands, 133, 136, 149.

20. For Ibn Ayyūb see Ṭabarī, III/4 2193.

21. See Le Strange, Lands, 108 ff.

22. For Abū al-Maghrā''s association with Ibn al-Shaykh, see Ṭabarī, III/3, 1685. Arzan was a fortified town near Āmid. See Le Strange, Lands, 112.

23. That is the eighth day of the pilgrimage. The day is so named because the pilgrims water their camels (tarwiyyah) this day, or because Abraham, who was to build the shrine, reflected (rawwa) on his dream of sacrificing Ishmael.

24. Three days journey east of al-Ahwāz. See Le Strange, Lands, 243, 247.

[1943] Why the Zanj Journied to Rāmhurmuz

We previously mentioned how Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Kurdī and 'Alī b. Abān, the companion of the abominable one, agreed to the reconciliation. It has also been reported that, because of what happened, 'Alī bore rancor in his heart against Muḥammad and was looking for a chance to wrong him. Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh knew of this, and sought ways of evading him. He corresponded with the abominable one's son —the son known as Ankalāy—asking him to plead with his father to assign his, that is, Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh's, district directly to him (Muḥammad) in order to remove 'Alī's control over him. This request was granted, but it only increased 'Alī's rage, and so he wrote to the abominable one, informing him that he was certain Muḥammad was plotting treachery. He requested permission to attack Muḥammad, and in order to create a pretext, he asked that the latter be ordered to deliver the tax revenues (kharāj) from his district to him ('Alī). This was granted and 'Alī wrote to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh to transfer the money to him. The latter put off payment, delaying the execution of this order. 'Alī therefore made preparations to engage him. He set out for him and attacked Rāmhurmuz where Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh was stationed. As Muḥammad lacked the means of stopping 'Alī, he fled. The latter thus entered Rāmhurmuz and ransacked the city, while Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh clung to the most distant strongholds of Arbaq and al-Bīlam.[25] Extremely frightened by 'Alī's action, Muḥammad wrote to him asking for a reconciliation. 'Alī in turn transmitted this request to the abominable one, and the latter instructed 'Alī to accept the offer and to make sure that Mu-[1944] ḥammad promptly delivered the money. Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh delivered two hundred thousand dirhams to 'Alī. The latter in turn, transferred the money to the abominable one and kept his distance from Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh and from districts under the latter's jurisdiction.

In this year, a battle took place between the Kurds of al-

25. Arbaq was situated in the area of Rāmhurmūz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 178. I have not succeeded in identifying Bīlam.

Dāribān and the Zanj of the abominable one. The Kurds were routed in this engagement.

The Battle Between the Zanj and the Kurds

After Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Azarmard surrendered the funds—the sum was previously reported—and after he had been left alone in the districts under his jurisdiction, he wrote to 'Alī b. Abān asking for his assistance against a group of Kurds from a place called al-Dāribān. He suggested that the booty should go to 'Alī and his troops.

'Alī wrote to the abominable one, asking permission to set out to do that. The latter replied, "Send al-Khalīl b. Abān and Bahbūdh b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb, but you stay put. Don't dispatch your troops until you receive hostages from Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh. The hostages will remain in your power and give you security against his treachery. You have irritated him, and he is not beyond seeking revenge."

In accordance with his instructions from the abdominable one, 'Alī wrote to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh asking for hostages. Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh gave him assurances and oaths, but evaded sending hostages. However, greed for the spoils which Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh excited in him, induced 'Alī to dispatch his troops alongside the former's forces. When the combined forces arrived at their destination, the local populace set out to fight and a battle ensued. At first the Zanj had the upper hand; but later the Kurds gallantly counterattacked, and the men of Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh treacherously deserted the field and fled. The Zanj troops retreated in utter disorder. [1945]

Before that, Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh had prepared a group who were specially instructed to intercept people in flight. This group interecepted and attacked those who had fled. They took spoils from them; they forced a contingent to dismount and took their horses. The men returned to 'Alī in terrible condition.

Al-Muhallabī wrote to the abominable one about what had happened to his men, and the latter replied reproachfully, "I had instructed you not to rely on Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh, but to have him send you hostages as a guarantee of cooperation. Now that you have disregarded my instructions and followed your own whim, you have brought ruin to yourself and your troops."

The abominable one also wrote to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh, "Your plot against the troops of 'Alī b. Abān is no secret to me and the punishment you deserve will not fail to come." This message frightened Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh, and he wrote the abominable one a letter filled with humility and submission. He also sent the horses which his men had taken from 'Alī's troops during the flight, and (a message which) said, "With all my troops I went against those who attacked al-Khalīl and Bahbūdh. I threatened and intimidated them until I made them return these horses which I am sending to you."

The abominable one showed his anger, threatening Muḥammad in writing that he would throw a huge army against him. Again Muḥammad sent a letter of humility and self-effacement to him. He also sent a message to Bahbūdh guaranteeing him money; likewise he wrote to Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Kirmānī, who at the time exerted the greatest influence [1946] upon 'Alī, and whose judgment was always accepted by him.

Bahbūdh, with the support of Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Kirmānī, went to 'Alī b. Abān to change his opinion in favor of Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh. They softened the rage and rancor which he held in his heart. Then they went to the abominable one, reaching him just when he received the letter from Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh. After lengthy discussions, he seemed to accept their view and thus agreed to reply favorably to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh. He said, "After all, that has happened, I am not going to accept less than a vow of allegiance to me in the sermons emanating from all the pulpits of the districts under his jurisdiction."

With this, Bahbūdh and al-Kirmānī left the abominable one and transmitted the result of their audience to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh. The latter answered that he would comply with every demand, but he acted evasively on the issue of vowing allegiance to the abominable one from the pulpits.

After all this, 'Alī remained put for a time; then he prepared to go against Mattūth[26] and marched there. He eagerly desired to take the city, but he could not do so because of its fortifications and the numerous defenders. Frustrated, he returned, assembled ladders and implements for scaling walls and, gathering his troops, he made himself ready. Masrūr al-Balkhī, who was then stationed in the districts of al-Ahwāz, knew that 'Alī was going to Mattūth. When 'Alī marched there for the second time, Masrūr also moved out and overtook him just near the city before sunset. When 'Alī's men saw the advance units of Masrūr's cavalry, they fled in a most shameful manner, leaving all the implements which they had brought. Humiliated, 'Alī retreated, suffering heavy losses. Soon the news followed that Abū Aḥmad was advancing. After his retreat from Mattūth, 'Alī engaged in no more battles until Sūq al-Khamīs and Ṭahīthā fell to Abū Aḥmad. Then, receiving a letter from the abominable one which urgently summoned him, 'Alī went to the latter's camp. [1947]

Leading the pilgrimmage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Isā al-Hāshimī al-Kūfī.

---

26. A fortified place (qal'ah ḥaṣīnah) between al-Ahwāz and Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 412–13.

The Events of the Year

267

(August 12, 880–July 31, 881)

In this year, the government jailed Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir b. ʿAbdallāh and some members of his household. This occurred soon after Aḥmad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Khujustānī routed ʿAmr b. al-Layth. The latter had brought accusations against Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir. He accused him of corresponding with al-Khujustānī and al-Ḥusayn b. Ṭāhir. He also accused al-Ḥusayn and al-Khujustānī of using the pulpits of Khurāsān to exhort the populace to give allegiance to Muḥammad b. Tāhir.

In this year, Abū al-ʿAbbās b. al-Muwaffaq seized all the towns of the Tigris districts, among them ʿAbdasī[27] and others, which Sulaymān b. Jāmiʿ, companion of the commander of the Zanj, had conquered.

27. A town in the Kaskar district north of Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, Lands, 43.

The Victory of Abū Al-'Abbās and His Activity Against the Zanj in This Area[28]

According to Muḥammad b. Al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. Ḥammād[29]: When news of how the Zanj entered Wāsiṭ and carried on (as reported above) reached Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil, he urged his son Abū al-'Abbās, to proceed to the area and fight against them. Abū al-'Abbās did so promptly. At the [1948] time of Abū al-'Abbās's departure, Abū Aḥmad rode to Bustān Mūsā al-Hādī[30] to inspect the troops and their equipment. This was during Rabi' II 266 (November 20–December 18, 879). There were altogether ten thousand cavalry and infantry, all decked out in the most beautiful and elegant uniforms, and outfitted with the best equipment. They were provided with barges (shadhdh), galleys (sumayriyyah) and ferrys (ma'ābir) for the infantry.[31] Everything was of the best construction.

Abū al-'Abbās left Bustān al-Hādī accompanied by Abū Aḥmad and travelled until he reached al-Firk.[32] Abū Aḥmad then departed and Abū al-'Abbās stayed on for several days to finish his preparations and to rally his troops. Following this, he departed for al-Madā'in, where he stayed for a time, and from there he went to Dayr al-'Aqūl.[33]

Muḥammad b. Ḥammād reported: My brother Isḥāq b. Ḥammād and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ismā'īl al-Hāshimī, who is known as Burayh, and Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb al-Ishtiyām and a large group of people who had accompanied Abū al-'Abbās in 28. For an analysis of this campaign see Popovic, Révolte, 123 ff.

29. A close companion of Abū Aḥmad and hence an eye witness to events. After the suppression of the Zanj revolt he was appointed over the judiciary of several districts. See Ṭabarī below, 2097.

30. Presumably the Bustān Mūsā at Baghdad. See Lassner, Topography, 295–96.

31. The designated translation for the various river vessels mentioned in the text is somewhat arbitrary. Any attempt to fix precise equivalents for the Arabic terms is hazardous. See Kindermann, Schiff, 42–43, 48, 54–55, 102.

32. A village near the Kalwādhā district of Baghdad. It may have been in the area subsequently known as al-Shammāsiyyah which served as a staging ground for troops. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 882; Lassner, Topography, index, 322.

33. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 676.

his march, told me what amounts to the following: Upon his arrival in Dayr al-'Aqūl, Abū al-'Abbās received a letter from Nuṣayr Abū Ḥamzah, the commander of the barges and galleys—he had been sent ahead with the vanguard. The letter informed him that Sulaymān b. Jāmi' had already reached the island, in the vicinity of Bardūdā. He had with him calvalry, infantry, barges and galleys. Al-Jubbā'ī was in the vanguard. Moreover Sulaymān b. Mūsa al-Sha'rānī had reached Nahr Abān with infantry, cavalry, and galleys. Abū al-'Abbās therefore departed for Jarjarāyā. From there he proceeded to Fam al-Ṣilḥ,[34] whence he travelled until he reached the canal. From there he sent out advance parties to gather information. They [1949] brought him word that the enemy's armies were approaching, and that their advance units were in the Ṣilḥ, while their rearguard was in Bustān Mūsā b. Bughā, below Wāsiṭ.

When he digested this report, Abū al-'Abbās turned from the main routes and changed course. His troops came upon the enemy's advance units, feigned retreat and provoked the latter into a headlong pursuit. The enemy soldiers started shouting, "Look for a general to lead you in battle. Yours is busy with hunting." As soon as they came close to Abū al-'Abbās at the Ṣilḥ, he attacked them with horsemen and infantry. At his command, the call went out to Nuṣayr, "How long will you run from these dogs? Get them!" Then Nuṣayr turned to face them. Abū al-'Abbās, along with Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb al-Ishtiyām, boarded a galley, while the troops encircled the enemy from all directions and then inflicted a crushing defeat upon them. God put the enemy to flight before Abū al-'Abbās and his troops, and they killed and chased the Zanj until they reached the village 'Abdallāh, which was some six farsakhs[35] (thirty-six km) from the place where the clash had started. They seized five barges and a number of galleys. Many of the enemy surrendered, others were taken prisoners, and the aforementioned ships were sunk. This was the first victory for Abū al-'Abbās, the son of Abū Aḥmad.

34. A town at the mouth of the Nahr al-Ṣilḥ above Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, Lands, 38.

35. One farsakh = three Arabic mīl, or six kms.

After the battle was over that day, his officers and close associates, fearful of the proximity of the enemy, advised Abū al-'Abbās to set up his camp at the place which he had reached along the Ṣilḥ Canal, but he insisted on stopping in Wāsiṭ. After Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and his troops were routed—a rout in which God had struck them severely—Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Shar'rānī retreated from Nahr Abān to Sūq al-Khamīs, while Sulaymān b. Jāmi' went to Nahr al-Amīr.[36] Before they encountered Abū al-'Abbās, the enemy held, "This is an immature youngster without much experience and training in warfare. The right thing for us to do is to fall upon him with all our strength and try to eliminate him in the very first encounter. Then, perhaps, he will be so terrified that he will withdraw altogether." [1950]

This they did, they rallied all their troops and concentrated their efforts, but God smote them with His power and vengeance. The day after the battle, Abū al-'Abbās entered Wāsiṭ in splendid attire. This being Friday, he remained there to say Friday prayers, and a great many people put themselves under his protection. Then he marched on to al-'Umr,[37] one farsakh (six km) away, and established his camp there, saying, "I will establish my camp below Wāsiṭ so that those who are above the camp will be safe from the Zanj." It was Nuṣayr Abū Ḥamzah, and al-Shāh b. Mīkāl, who advised him to establish his position above Wāsiṭ, but he declined, saying, "I am only camping at al-'Umr. Both of you, go down to the mouth of the Bardūdā." Thus Abū al-'Abbās, shunning the counsel of his companions, and refusing to listen to any of their views, stopped at al-'Umr and started constructing barges.

Thereafter he began raiding the enemy incessantly. He assigned his special pages to galleys, placing two on each vessel. Sulaymān, as well, made ready and rallied his troops. He divided them into three columns: one coming from Nahr Abān, 36. The original name of this canal was Nahr Amīr al-Mu'minīn; that is, the Canal of the Commander of the Faithful. The reference is to the Caliph Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr who had the canal dug in the area of al-Baṣrah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 835.

37. This place is identical with 'Umr Kaskar, although it is also referred to as 'Umr Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 724, 726.

another from Barrtumartā,[38] and still another from Bardūdā. Abū al-'Abbās encountered them, and shortly thereafter they were put to flight. One contingent of the enemy remained behind at Sūq al-Khamīs, and another at Māzarwān.

Some of Abū al-'Abbās's troops started (to chase the Zanj) [1951] from Barrtumartā, while others took hold of al-Madiyān. Abū Aḥmad did not stop until he reached Nahr Bar Musāwir. Thereupon, with the help of guides, he began inspecting the villages and roads until he returned to his camp and remained there to rest himself and his troops.

While there, an informant came with a report that the Zanj had assembled their forces, preparing to take his army by surprise, and that they were approaching from three directions. He further reported that they said that Abū al-'Abbās was a heedless youngster who would rush headlong into peril, and therefore they had decided to set up an ambush and to proceed towards him from three directions as mentioned above. Abū Aḥmad showed caution and prepared for this contingency.

Indeed, the Zanj had marched out towards him, after having placed some ten thousand men at Barrtumartā and about the same number at Quss Ḥathā.[39] They sent out twenty galleys against the (government) camp to lure the defenders past the positions of the ambushers. But Abū al-'Abbās prevented his men from chasing after them. When the foe perceived that their ruse failed, al-Jubbā'ī and Sulaymān came into the open with their barges and galleys. Abū al-'Abbās, however, had his troops realigned superbly; he instructed Nuṣayr Abū Ḥamzah to set forth with his barges against the enemy. Abū al-'Abbās himself dismounted and summoned one of his barges, which he named "the Gazelle [al-Ghazāl]." He instructed the captain Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb to select oarsmen for this vessel, which he boarded. He also selected from among his special troops and pages a detachment which he armed with spears. Then he ordered the cavalry to march before him along the bank of the river, warning them, "As far as possible do not slow your

38. Read: Bar Tumartā (?)

39. Perhaps confused with Qusyathā, mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 99, as a place in Iraq.

march until waterways obstruct your passage." He also ordered [1952] the transfer of some of the horses which were in Bardūdā.

The battle between the opposing factions flared up. The field of conflict ran from the limits of the village al-Raml to al-Ruṣāfah.[40] The Zanj were defeated and Abū al-'Abbās's troops seized fourteen barges. Sulaymān and al-Jubbā'ī fled that day, escaping death on foot. Their horses with all their ornaments and harnesses were seized. The entire government army, without losing a single soldier, reached Ṭahīthā and delivered their equipment. Abū al-'Abbās returned to his camp in al-'Umr and remained there. He ordered that all the seized barges and galleys be repaired and manned. For twenty days after that, none of the Zanj appeared. Every three days al-Jubbā'ī would go out with his scouts and return. Above the Sindād Canal he dug pits and at the base of the pits he planted iron rods and covered them with rush mats, thus concealing their position. These pits, intentionally scattered along the route usually taken by horsemen, were to trap bypassers. Then he would approach the flanks of Abū al-'Abbās's camp, showing himself to the troops there so that their horsemen would go out to pursue him.

One day, he came and the horsemen started to pursue him as usual, when the horse of an officer from Farghānah tumbled into one of those pits. Abū al-'Abbās's troops therefore became aware of the ruse that al-Jubbā'ī had conceived, and they took precautions to avoid passing along that road. The Zanj harassed the camp in the early morning every day to provoke an engagement; they even camped at Nahr al-Amīr in force, but all this was to no avail. They abstained from fighting for about a month. [1953]

Now Sulaymān wrote to the leader of the Zanj, requesting the latter to reinforce him with galleys of forty oarsmen each. And, indeed, within some twenty days forty galleys arrived, each carrying two army men. All the sailors were provided with swords, spears and shields. Al-Jubbā'ī established his position opposite the army of Abū al-'Abbās, and the opposing forces resumed contact daily. But whenever the troops of Abū al-'Abbās set out against al-Jubbā'ī's forces, the latter, instead of holding fast to their positions, would retreat, while their skirmishers destroyed bridges, shot at horsemen appearing within the range of their arrows, or set fire to vessels of Nuṣayr which they found out on patrol. This went on for about two months, after which Abū al-'Abbās saw to it that an ambush was set up for the enemy at the village of Raml and several galleys were advanced ahead of the troops to serve as bait. Abū al-'Abbās also ordered two galleys, one for himself and one for Zīrak, and selectd for these vessels a number of his pages whom he knew to be gallant fighters. He assigned Badr and Mū'nis to one galley, Rashīq al-Ḥajjājī and Yumn to another, Khafīf and Yusr to a third, and Nadhīr and Wasīf to a fourth. He prepared fifteen galleys, with two army men in each, and sent them ahead of the armed force.

40. That is, Ruṣāfat Wāsiṭ. A village in the adminsitrative district of Wāsiṭ some ten farsakhs (sixty kms) from the city. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 788.

Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb al-Ishtiyām reported: On that day, I was among those who were sent ahead. The Zanj seized a number of the advancing galleys and took prisoners. I hastily called out in a loud voice, "The enemy has seized our galleys." Upon hearing this, Abū al-'Abbās, who was taking his breakfast, [1954] rushed toward the galleys which had been prepared for him. The army moved forward, but Abū al-'Abbās did not wait for his men to join him; only those who were prepared to move swiftly followed him. We reached the Zanj and when they saw us, God filled their hearts with terror, and they plunged into the water and fled. We rescued our troops and captured thirty-one of the Zanj galleys, however, al-Jubbā'ī escaped with three of them. That day Abū al-'Abbās fired so many shots from his bow that his thumbs started bleeding, and he withdrew. I think that if we had persisted making a maximum effort in pursuing al-Jubbā'ī on that day, we could have seized him; but we refrained from doing so because of extreme fatigue.

Abū al-'Abbās and most of his troops returned to their places at the mouth of the Bardūdā, without having lost a single man. Upon arriving at his camp, Abū al-'Abbās bestowed on all those who had gone with him necklaces, robes of honor, and rings, and ordered that the galleys seized from the Zanj be repaired.

He instructed Abū Ḥamzah to take up positions with his men and barges on the Tigris in front of Khusrūsābūr.[41]

Abū al-ʿAbbās then decided to penetrate (enemy territory) along the Māzarwān Canal to the town called al-Ḥajjājiyyah, and then on to Nahr al-Amīr. Positioning himself at these places, he would find out about the routes followed by the Zanj galleys. Nuṣayr was ordered to move out with his barges and galleys. He went on this mission, leaving the road to Māzarwān for the area of Nahr al-Amīr. Abū al-ʿAbbās now summoned his galley and sailed with Muḥammad b. Shuʿayb; then he entered Māzarwān. Believing that Nuṣayr was in front of him, he said to Muḥammad, "Go ahead up the river so that I might have news of Nuṣayr." Then he ordered the barge and galleys to follow Muḥammad.

Muḥammad b. Shuʿayb reported: We proceeded until, close [1955] to al-Ḥajjājiyyah, we came upon a transport (ṣalghah) with ten Zanj. We rushed toward it and the Zanj threw themselves into the water. Taking possession of the boat, we discovered that it was full of barley. When we discovered there was a Zanj in it, we seized him and questioned him about Nuṣayr and his barges. But he told us "No barge or galley has entered this waterway." We were perplexed. Meanwhile, the Zanj who had slipped through our hands went and informed their comrades of our whereabouts. Our sailors noticed some sheep and went ashore to carry them off.

Muḥammad b. Shuʿayb reported: I alone remained with Abū al-ʿAbbās. Before long a Zanj commander named Muntāb appeared with a group of men on one side of the canal, and ten of the Zanj appeared on the other. Seeing this, we rushed out, Abū al-ʿAbbās with his bow and arrows and I with my spear. I covered him while he shot arrows at the Zanj, wounding two of them. But they pressed the attack and their numbers increased. We espied Zīrak with the barges and the pages accompanying him. By that time, some 2,000 Zanj were around us on both sides of Māzarwān. But God meted out their due and drove the Zanj back, utterly humiliated. Abū al-'Abbās returned to his camp. His troops had seized great numbers of sheep, cows and water buffaloes. He ordered that three of the sailors who had been with him, and had then left to seize the cattle, be beheaded; those who had stayed on duty were to be given a month's pay. Abū al-'Abbās also issued a warning that none of [1956] the sailors were to leave their galleys in time of battle, and that the death penalty would be imposed upon those who violated this order. The Zanj fled together to Ṭahīthā. Abū al-'Abbās stayed in his camp at al-'Umr while patrols fanned out over all the surrounding areas. This situation lasted for some time.

41. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 442, indicates that the general populace referred to it as Khussābūr. It was a village situated some five farsakhs (thirty kms) from Wāsiṭ.

Meanwhile, Sulaymān b. Jāmi' gathered his troops and officers and entrenched himself at Ṭahīthā, while al-Sha'rānī did the same at Sūq al-Khamīs. At al-Ṣīniyyah[42] they also had a huge army comanded by one Naṣr al-Sindī. They began to ransack everything within reach, carrying off whatever they could of the crops, and fortifying the places where they were stationed.

Abū al-'Abbās sent out some of his commanders on horseback to the environs of al-Ṣīniyyah. Among them were al-Shāh, Kumushjūr, al-Faḍl b. Mūsā b. Bughā and his brother Muḥammad. Abū al-'Abbās, along with Nuṣayr and Zīrak, sailed on the barges and transports. He ordered that the cavalry be transferred from Bar Musāwir to the road to al-Ẓuhr. The army advanced until it reached al-Hurth, whereupon Abū al-'Abbās ordered that the beasts of burden be transferred there. The animals were transported across the water, thereby reaching the western side of the Tigris. Abū al-'Abbās then instructed the army to march along the road to Dayr al-'Ummāl.[43]

When the Zanj noticed the cavalry, they were seized with terror and escaped to the water and their vessels. Before long they were overtaken by (Abū al-'Abbās's) barges and galleys. Seeing that there was no escape, the Zanj sought to surrender.

---

42. Al-Ṣīniyyah was reportedly a small town (bulaydah) below Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 458.

43. A town below Nahr Abān in the vicinity of Wāsiṭ. See Le Strange, Lands, 41.

A group of them were killed, others were captured, and some jumped into the water. The troops of Abū al-'Abbās seized their vessels which were filled with rice that now fell into the hands of the government forces. They also seized the galley of the [1957] Zanj commander known as Naṣr al-Sindī. The rest of the Zanj fled, one contingent to Ṭahīthā, and the other to Sūq al-Khamīs. Abū al-'Abbās thus returned to his camp filled with booty. He had conquered al-Ṣīniyyah and expelled the Zanj from there.

Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb reported: While we were fighting the Zanj at al-Ṣīniyyah, Abū al-'Abbās noticed a Numidian crane in flight. He aimed at it and pierced it with his arrow. The crane fell to the ground in front of the Zanj, who picked it up and, examining the hole of the wound, perceived that it was caused by the arrow of Abū al-'Abbās. This heightened their fear and was the reason for their flight.

Some reliable sources report that Abū al-'Abbās shot the arrow at the crane on another occasion.

Word reached Abū al-'Abbās that a huge force led by two Zanj, Thābit b. Abī Dulaf and Lu'lu', was stationed at 'Abdasī.[44] With a detachment of horsemen selected from his most valiant pages and courageous officers he marched to 'Abdasī to engage the enemy. At dawn he reached the spot where they were located, and dealt them a crushing blow, killing a great many of their best men. The Zanj force was routed. Abū al-'Abbās captured its leader, Thābit b. Abī Dulaf and, sparing his life, he entrusted him to one of his officers. The one named Lu'lu' was struck by an arrow which killed him. A great many women who were in the hands of the Zanj were rescued on that day. Abū al-'Abbās ordered that they be set free and returned to [1958] their families. He seized everything that the Zanj had collected.

Abū al-'Abbās then returned to his camp and ordered his troops to rest in preparation for marching against Sūq al-Khamīs. He summoned Nuṣayr and instructed him to get his men ready to march. Nuṣayr said to him, "The canal to Sūq al-Khamīs is narrow. Stay here and allow me to go there to check it out." But Abū al-'Abbās refused to permit this because he was expecting the arrival of his father, Abū Aḥmad, from whom he had received a letter saying that he had decided to come.

44. A city in the Kaskar district. See Le Strange Lands, 42, 43.

Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb reported: Abū al-'Abbās called me and said, "I must take Sūq al-Khamīs." To this I retorted, "If, as you say, it is absolutely necessary for you to do this, do not take a great number of people in the barge. At any rate, take no more than thirteen pages, ten archers and three spear bearers, since I would hate to have the barge overcrowded in this narrow canal."

Abū al-'Abbās made himself ready and marched out with Nuṣayr in the lead. When they reached the mouth of (the canal to) Bar Musāwir, Nuṣayr said: "Send me ahead." Abū al-'Abbās concurred, and Nuṣayr proceeded with fifteen barges. One of the officers from among the mawlās (clients), Mūsā Daljawayh, who had asked permission to go forward, was allowed to do so, and he went along.

Abū al-'Abbās advanced until his journey took him to Basāmī; from there he went to the mouth of the Barātiq, then to the Riqq Canal, and finally to the waterway crossing Rawāṭā and 'Abdasī.[45] These three waterways led to three divergent [1959] roads. Nuṣayr set out on the road along the Barātiq Canal, that is, the road leading to Madīnat Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Sha'rānī, which he named The Fortress of Sūq al-Khamīs (al-Manī'ah bi–Sūq al-Khamīs). Abū al-'Abbās stayed at the mouth of this canal and Nuṣayr (advanced until he) disappeared from sight, and nothing further was heard of him. Now a great many of the Zanj came out against us at this place, and hindered us from entering the canal. They positioned themselves between us and the approaches to the walls—the distance between the place which we had reached and the walls surrounding Madīnat al-Sha'rānī was about two farsakhs (twelve km) They stood their ground there and engaged us in combat. The battle between us—they fighting on land, and we aboard ships at the edge of the canal—raged from the beginning of the day to noon, by which time we still had no word from Nuṣayr. Then the

45. Other than 'Abdasī, I have not succeeded in identifying these locations.

Zanj began shouting, "We caught Nuṣayr. What are you going to do? We shall follow you wherever you go!"

Abū al-'Abbās became very worried when he heard this, and Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb asked permission to go and find out what had happened to Nuṣayr. This being granted, he went off in a galley with twenty oarsmen and reached Nuṣayr Abū Ḥamzah who had approached the dam which the profligates had set up. They discovered that he had just set fire to the dam and to their city (madīnah), and that he had engaged in a violent but victorious struggle with them. The Zanj had initially seized some of Abū Ḥamzah's barges, but he succeeded in recovering them.

Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb returned to Abū al-'Abbās and reported the good news that Nuṣayr and his men were safe, and told him of their exploits. Abū Aṃmad rejoiced at this. On that day Nuṣayr captured a great many Zanj and then returned to the place where Abū al-'Abbās was positioned. [1960]

Upon Nuṣayr's return, Abū al-'Abbās said, "I am not leaving this place until I fight them again tonight." And this he did. He instructed his men to expose one of his barges in full view of the Zanj, while concealing the rest. At the sight of the vessel, the Zanj, anxious to capture it, started off in pursuit. Now the crew of that barge kept it to a slow course so that the Zanj overtook it and held fast to the rudder. Then the sailors started to race so as to reach the position of the barges which lay in ambush.

Abū al-'Abbās, wearing a felt vest above his coat of mail, was aboard a galley—he had placed his barge behind him. When he noticed the barge which the Zanj clung to, he rushed toward it. He perceived it just as the Zanj grasped its rudders, surrounding it from all sides, and showered it with arrows and stone.

Muḥammad (continued): On that day we extracted twenty-five arrows from the felt vest of Abū al-'Abbās. I extracted forty arrows from the felt cap I had on, and from the rest of the sailor's felt caps twenty-five to thirty arrows. God rendered into the hands of Abū al-'Abbās six Zanj galleys; the barge was rescued and the Zanj fled. Abū al-'Abbās and his men repaired to the bank and charged the Zanj warriors with their swords and shields. The enemy fled in panic without looking back. Safely, and with booty, Abū al-'Abbās returned. He clothed his sailors with robes of honor and bestowed gifts upon them. Then he returned to his camp at al-'Umr and remained there until the arrival of al-Muwaffaq.

[1961] On the eleventh of Ṣafar (September 22, 880) Abū Aḥmad b. al-Mutawakkil camped at al-Firk. Then he departed from Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) heading towards the camp of the leader of the Zanj, intending to do combat with him. The reason for this, according to reports, was that word had reached Abū Aḥmad that the leader of the Zanj had written to his lieutenant, 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī, instructing him to march with all his troops to the location of Sulaymān b. Jāmi', in order to join forces with the latter in fighting Abū al-'Abbās b. Abī Aḥmad.

Abū Aḥmad remained in al-Firk for several days to permit his troops, and any others who wanted to proceed with him, to join on. He had prepared the barges, galleys, ferries and boats. Then, on Tuesday, the second of Rabī' I (October 11, 880), he and his clients, pages, cavalry and infantry reportedly left al-Firk, bound for Rūmiyat al-Madā'in.[46] From there they journeyed on stopping at al-Sīb,[47] Dayr al-'Aqūl,[48], Jarjarāyā, Qunnā,[49] Jabbul,[50] al-Ṣilḥ and a place one farsakh (six km) from Wāsiṭ. He remained at the latter for one day and one night and was met by his son Abū al-'Abbās and a squadron of cavalry including his leading officers and men. Abū Aḥmad inquired about the state of his men, and getting from his son a picture of their gallantry and devotion in fighting, he ordered that robes of honor be bestowed upon them and Abū al-'Abbās. Thereupon, the son returned to his camp at al-'Umr where he remained throughout the day. In the early morning of the next day, Abū Aḥmad took 46. According to Muslim authors, al-Madā'in, "the cities," received its name because it was an urban center formed from seven cities, one of which was Rūmiyyah. See Le Strange, Lands, 34.

47. Le Strange, Lands, 41.
48. Ibid., 35.
49. Ibid., 36.
50. Ibid., 38.

to the water where he was met by his son, Abū al-'Abbās, and all his troops in military formation, as fully equipped as they would be when confronting the traitor's forces. Abū Aḥmad sailed on until he reached his camp on the waterway called Shīrzād, where he stopped. On Thursday, the twenty-eighth of [1962] Rabī' I (November 6, 880), he departed from there and stopped at the canal called Nahr Sindād, opposite the village called 'Abdallāh. He instructed his son Abū al-'Abbās to halt on the eastern side of the Tigris, opposite the mouth of the Bardūdā, and put him in charge of the vanguard. Then he allotted the soldiers' allowances and paid them. Following that, he instructed his son to advance in front of him with the equipment that he had in his possession, toward the mouth of the Bar Musāwir Canal.

Abū al-'Abbās set out with the best of his officers and troops, including Zīrak al-Turkī, the commander of his vanguard, and Nuṣayr Abū Ḥamzah, the commander of the barges and galleys. After this it was Abū Aḥmad who set out with his selected cavalry and infantry, leaving the bulk of his army and many of his horsemen and foot soldiers behind in his place of encampment.

His son Abū al-'Abbās met him with a show of captives, heads and bodies of slain enemies from among the troops of al-Sha'rānī. For, on that same day, before the arrival of his father Abū Aḥmad, Abū al-'Abbās had been attacked by al-Sha'rānī who came upon the former's camp. Abū al-'Abbās dealt him a severe blow, killing a great many of his men and taking captives. Abū Aḥmad ordered that the captives be beheaded, which was done. Then Abū Aḥmad descended to the mouth of the Bar Musāwir, where he stayed for two days. From there, on Tuesday, the eighth of Rabi' II (November 17, 880), he departed from Sūq al-Khamīs with all his men and equipment bound for the city which the leader of the Zanj had named al-Manī'ah bi-Sūq al-Khamīs. He proceeded with his ships along the Bar Musāwir while the cavalry marched before him along the eastern side of the waterway until they reached the waterway called Barātiq, which led to Madīnat al-Sha'rānī. Abū Aḥmad [1963] preferred to begin fighting against Mūsā al-Sha'rānī before he fought Sulaymān b. Jāmi' because he feared that al-Sha'rānī, who was to his rear, might attack and thus divert him from the adversary in front of him. That is why he set out against al-Sha'rānī. He ordered the cavalry to cross the canal and proceed along both banks of the Barātiq. Abū Aḥmad also instructed his son Abū al-'Abbās to advance with a flotilla of barges and galleys, and he himself followed with barges along with the bulk of his army.

When Sulaymān, his Zanj troops and others noticed the cavalry and infantry proceeding on both banks of the canal and the ships advancing along the waterway—this was after Abū al-'Abbās had met them and engaged them in a skirmish—they fled and scattered. The troops of Abū al-'Abbās climbed the walls killing those who opposed them. When the Zanj and their supporters scattered, Abū al-'Abbās and his forces entered the city, killed a great many of its people, took many prisoners and laid hold of whatever was there. Al-Sha'rānī and the others who escaped with him fled; they were pursued by Abū Aḥmad's men up to the marshes where many drowned. The rest saved themselves by fleeing into the thickets.

Thereupon, Abū Aḥmad instructed his troops to return to their camp before sunset of that Tuesday, and he withdrew. About five thousand Muslim women and some Zanj women, who were taken in Sūq al-Khamīs, were saved. Abū Aḥmad gave instructions to take care of all the women, to transfer them to Wāsiṭ and return them to their families.

[1964] Abū Aḥmad spent that night opposite the Barātiq Canal and in the early morning of the next day, he entered the city and gave the people permission to take all the Zanj possessions there. Everything in the city was seized. Abū Aḥmad ordered the walls razed, the trenches filled, and the remaining ships burned. He left for his camp at Bar Musāwir with booty taken in the districts (rustāq) and villages previously possessed by al-Sha'rānī and his men; this included crops of wheat, barley and rice. He ordered that the crops be sold and the money realized from the sale be spent to pay his mawlā's pages, the troops of his regular army, and other people of his camp.

Sulaymān al-Sha'rānī escaped with his two brothers and others, but he lost his children and possessions. Upon reaching al-Madhār he reported to the traitor (that is, the leader of the Zanj) what had befallen him and that he had taken refuge in al-Madhār.[51]

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. Hishām, known as Abū Wāthilah al-Kirmānī: I was in the presence of the traitor—he was having a discussion—when the letter from Sulaymān al-Sha'rānī arrived with the news of the battle and his flight to al-Madhār. As soon as he had the letter unsealed and his eye fell on the passage describing the defeat, his bowel muscles loosened and he got up to relieve himself, then he returned. As his Assembly came to order, he took the letter and began reading it again, and when he reached the passage which had disturbed him the first time, he left once more. This repeated itself several times. There remained no doubt that the calamity was great, and I refrained from asking him questions. After some time had elapsed, I ventured to say, "Isn't this the letter from Sulaymān b. Mūsā?" He replied, "Yes, and a piece of heartbreaking news, too. Indeed, those who fell upon him dealt him a crushing blow 'that will not spare nor leave unburned.'[52] He has written this letter from al- [1965] Madhār, and he has barely saved his own skin."

I deemed this news momentous and only God knows what a joy filled my heart, but I concealed it and refrained from rejoicing at the prospect of the approaching relief. However, the traitor regained self-control in face of vicissitude, and showed firmness. He wrote to Sulaymān b. Jāmi', cautioning him against al-Sha'rānī's fate and instructing him to be vigilant and watchful concerning what might lie before him.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. al-Ḥammād: Al-Muwaffaq stayed in his camp at Bar Musāwir for two days to gather information about al-Sha'rānī and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and to discover the latter's base. When some of those

51. Ibid., 42, 43.
52. That is, a crushing blow. See Qur'ān LXXIV: 28; Lane, Lexicon, I, 298.

sent out for this purpose brought him information that Sulaymān b. Jāmi' was encamped in the village called al-Ḥawānīt,[53] he immediately ordered the cavalry to cross to the Kaskar area on the western bank of the Tigris. He himself journeyed by boat and ordered the barges and infantry transports to proceed down to al-Kathīthah. Al-Muwaffaq left the bulk of his army, including a large troop of infantry and horses, at the mouth of Bar Musâwir and instructed Bughrāj to remain positioned there. Upon his arrival in al-Ṣīniyyah, Abū Aḥmad instructed Abū al-'Abbās to advance promptly with barges and galleys to al-Ḥawānīt in order to verify the information about Sulaymān b. Jāmi''s whereabouts. If the enemy were to display slackness, Abū al-'Abbās was to attack him. That same evening Abū al-'Abbās arrived in al-Ḥawānīt and, instead of Sulaymān, he found the black officers, Shibl and Abū al-Nidā'—two of the earliest companions of the rebel. Both were famous for their [1966] courage and bravery, and were associated with him from the very beginning of his revolt. The officers had been left there by Sulaymān b. Jāmi' to guard vast crops in the area. Abū al-'Abbās engaged them, moving his barges into a narrow spot in the waterway. He killed some of their infantry, and injured many others with arrows. These were the most valiant of Sulaymān b. Jāmi''s men, the chosen ones on whom he relied. The battle between the opposing factions lasted until night intervened.

According to Muḥammad b. Ḥammād: This was the battle in which Abū al-'Abbās shot the crane, and to which Muḥammad b. Shu'ayb referred as the Battle of al-Ṣīniyyah—the bird passed on his right side.

On that day a man surrendered to Abū al-'Abbās. When Abū al-'Abbās asked him about Sulaymān b. Jāmi''s location, he reported that the latter was stationed in Ṭahīthā. At this, Abū al-'Abbās returned to his father with the news that Sulaymān's true location was the city which he named al-Manṣūrah, and which was in the place known as Ṭahīthā.[54] In addition, he told 53. Le Strange, Lands, 41.

54. The term for "city" is madīnah, which very often means administrative center.

his father that all of Sulaymān's officers were with him there except for Shibl and Abū al-Nidā', who were at al-Ḥawānīt which they had been ordered to guard. As soon as he learned this, Abū Aḥmad gave the order to set out for Bardūdā, since from there the road led to Ṭahīthā. Abū al-'Abbās went ahead with barges and galleys and instructed all those left behind at Barr Musāwir to march to Bardūdā. On the day after he had given instructions to Abū al-'Abbās, Abū Aḥmad left for Bardūdā and, after two days' march, on Friday the seventeenth of Rabī' II, 267 (November 26, 880), he arrived there. He remained to make whatever repairs were needed for his army, to effect the payment of the soldiers, and to repair the ferries that were [1967] to be taken along. He also picked up numerous workers and the equipment needed to block canals and repair roads for the horses. He left Bughrāj al-Turkī behind in Bardūdā.

When Abū Aḥmad decided to go to Bardūdā, he ordered a page of his called Ju'lān—he had been left with Bughrāj in his camp—to take down his tents and forward them and the weapons to Bardūdā with the animals which had been left at his camp. At the time of the late evening prayer, when the people did not expect it, Ju'lān disclosed the order he had received. This made them suspect that the order was given because of a defeat, and thus they ran headlong from the camp abandoning their tents and provisions. Fearful that the enemy was very close, they scattered so that no two remained together and, in the dark of the night, they all fled towards their camp in Bardūdā. Subsequently, they learned the true state of affairs and, calming down, they regained composure.

In the month of Ṣafar (September 11–October 8, 880), the troops of Kayghalagh al-Turkī and those of Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf engaged in a battle in the vicinity of Qarmāsīn. Kayghalagh emerged victorious and proceeded to Hamadhān. But in the same month, Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, with the troops which he had rallied to his side, came upon Kayghalagh and attacked him; the latter was routed and set off for al-Ṣaymarah.

On the twenty-sixth of Rabī' II (December 4, 880), Abū Aḥmad and his troops entered Ṭahīthā and ousted Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. In this battle Aḥmad b. Mahdī al-Jubbā'ī was killed.

[1968] How Abū Aḥmad and His Troops Occupied Ṭahīthā and How al-Jubbā'ī Was Killed[55]

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. Ḥammād: In Bardūdā, Abū Aḥmad paid his troops and repaired the equipment of those going to fight against the leader of the rebellion. Having done so, he set out in the direction of Ṭahīthā. This was on Sunday, the eighteenth of Rabī' II, 267 (November 26, 880). He proceeded on horseback with his cavalry. The vessels were sent on with whatever they carried as regards infantry, weapons, and equipment. Also sent on were ferries, barges and galleys. They proceeded until he met them at the waterway called Nahr Mahrūdh[56] in the vicinity of the village called Qaryat al-Jawziyyah. Here Abū Aḥmad camped and ordered that a pontoon bridge be moored at the above-mentioned waterway. He remained there for a day and night. On the next day, he sent the horses and equipment over the bridge in his presence; then he crossed too and gave the order to his officers and troops to march to Ṭahīthā. They advanced to a place which Abū Aḥmad chose as quarters for himself, within two miles of the city of Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. Here, facing the troops of the perifidious one (that is, the leader of the Zanj), they stayed during Monday and Tuesday, the twenty-first of Rabī' II (November 29–30, 880). Then a heavy downpour began, and an intense cold afflicted his troops during the days of his stay there. Rain and cold prevented him from fighting, and they did not engage in battle until the end of the week. It was only on Friday evening that Abū Aḥmad with a small group of his officers and clients set out in search of a place to deploy his cav-[1969] alry. He advanced close to the walls of (the city of) Sulaymān b. Jāmi', where numerous troops of the enemy confronted them. Ambushers attacked them from different positions, and an engagement which gave rise to heavy fighting broke out. A detachment of horsemen dismounted and fought back until they escaped from the straits into which they had gotten themselves. One of Abū Aḥmad's pages and officers, Wasīf 'Alamdār by name, and a number of Zīrak's officers were taken prisoner. Abū al-'Abbās fired an arrow which hit Aḥmad b. Mahdī al-Jubbā'ī in one of his nostrils and penetrated all the way to his brain. Hit, al-Jubbā'ī fell from his horse and was carried back on his final journey to the camp of the perfidious one. The latter was very distressed by this calamity because al-Jubbā'ī had been his most steadfast and indispensable lieutenant, and had the most foresight of all his followers. Al-Jubbā'ī lingered for a few days while being treated, and then he died. Griefstricken, the perifidious one took charge of the final ablutions, of putting the body in a shroud and of the funeral service. Then he stood by al-Jubbā'ī's grave until he was buried. Following this, he addressed his troops with a sermon in which he spoke of the death of al-Jubbā'ī. This death occurred on a night of thunder and lightning, and the perfidious one was reported to have said; "I knew the time of his soul's ascent before word of his death came to to me, because I heard the chant of the angels praying for him and pleading for mercy for him."

55. See Popovic, Révolte, 130 ff.

56. Yāqūt mentions a canal of this name in the Baghdad region. See Mu'jam, IV, 700, It is difficult to see how this waterway can be identified with the canal of this text.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported: Abū Wāthilah,[57] who was among those present at the sermon, came to me and began to amaze me with stories he had heard; then, Muḥammad b. Sim-'ān came to me and told me stories similar to those of Muḥammad b. Ḥishām. The perfidious one left the interment of al-Jubbā'ī grieved and broken-hearted.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. Ḥammād: when Abū Aḥmad returned from the engagement [1970] which took place Friday night, the twenty-fifth of Rabī' II (December 2, 880), news of it had already reached his camp. All of his army went out to meet him and they encountered him on his way back. As it was already sunset, Abū Aḥmad had them return to camp. When all the people of his camp were together, he instructed them to be on the alert that night in alternate shifts and to get ready for battle. When they arose on the morning of Saturday, the twenty-sixth of Rabī' II (December 3, 880), Abū Aḥmad arrange his troops in military formations, alternating squadrons of cavalry with infantry. He ordered that the barges and galleys proceed with him along the waterway called Nahr al-Mundhir, which bisects the city of Ṭahīthā.

57. That is, Muḥammad b. Hishām al-Kirmānī.

Thus he advanced toward the Zanj until he reached the walls of the city; there he assigned officers from among his pages to the places from which he feared the Zanj might attack him. He positioned the infantry in front of the horsemen and assigned them to positions from which he feared ambushers might strike. Then he stopped and performed four rak'ahs, imploring God to extend his help to him and to the Muslims. Following that, he called for his arms. He put them on, and ordered his son Abū al-'Abbās to advance to the walls and rouse the pages to combat; this was done.

Sulaymān b. Jāmi' had a moat prepared before the walls of his city, that is, the city which he named al-Manṣūrah. When they reached this moat, the pages were startled and hesitated to cross, but the officers urged them on. Along with them, the officers dismounted from their horses, and with daring they rushed into the moat and crossed it. They came upon the Zanj, looking down the walls of their city and put them to the sword.
[1971] A party of horsemen also waded through the moat. When the Zanj saw these people who (had already) encountered them, coming again, they turned about and fled. Abū Aḥmad's men chased after them and entered the city from all sides. The Zanj had fortified it with five moats, each with a (protective) wall to make them impassable. The enemy made his stand behind each wall and moat reached by the government troops, but Abū Aḥmad's men drove them from every defensive position. The barges and galleys penetrated the city by the waterway traversing it, after the Zanj had been put to flight. Now the government ships started to sink every barge and galley which they passed. They chased the enemy on both sides of the canal, killing and capturing until they ousted him from the city and from about a farsakh (six km) of the adjacent territory. Abū Aḥmad then took control of the entire area.

Sulaymān b. Jāmi' escaped with only a small group of his men, losing the rest to death and captivity in this violent fight. Abū Aḥmad rescued about ten thousand women and children (taken captive) from the people of Wāsiṭ and the adjacent villages as well as from surroundings at al-Kūfah. He ordered them placed under protection and care. They were then transferred to Wāsiṭ and delivered to their families. Abū Aḥmad and his men took hold of all stores, money, food and cattle in the city, which came to an enormous amount; the crops and other things obtained he ordered sold, and the proceeds of the sale were transferred to his treasury to be disbursed as pay to the mawlās and troops of his camp. They carried away everything transportable, and captured a number of Sulaymān's wives and children. On that day, Waṣīf 'Alamdār and others who were captured with him on that Friday eve were rescued and taken [1972] from the prison, thus preventing their death at the hands of the Zanj.

A great many of the Zanj who escaped fled into the thickets around the city. On Abū Aḥmad's order, a pontoon bridge was laid across the waterway known as Nahr al-Mundhir and the people passed over it to the western side. Abū Aḥmad remained in Ṭahīthā for seventeen days, and ordered that the walls be razed and the moats filled. This being done, he ordered a search for the fugitives in the thickets, establishing a prize for everyone bringing in a prisoner. The people thus vied with one another in searching for them. Now, if one was brought in, Abū Aḥmad would pardon him, bestow upon him robes of honor, and assign him to the officers in charge of the pages. By doing this, he won them over, causing them to defect from their master.

Abū Aḥmad directed Nuṣayr to take his barges and galleys and pursue Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and the fugitives, that is, Zanj and others who were with him. He ordered Nuṣayr to pursue them vigorously through the marshes until entering that part of the Tigris which was called the Blind Tigris (Dijlat al-'Awrā').[58] Then he proceeded to open up the dams which the profligate had built, in order to cut off the barges on the Tigris from access to the area between his position and the waterway known as Abū al-Khaṣīb. He sent word to Zīrak to stay in Ṭahīthā so that its inhabitants, who had been driven away by the profligate (that is, the leader of the Zanj), might gradually return, and instructed him, as well, to search for the rest of the Zanj who still remained in the thickets and to capture them.

58. See Le Strange, Lands, 26, 43.

In the month of Rabī' II (November 9–December 7, 880), Umm Jabīb, the daughter of al-Rashīd passed away.

Having accomplished what he wanted, Abū Aḥmad returned to his camp in Bardūdā; he had set his mind on going to al-Ahwāz to put the affairs of that province in order. For a long [1973] time he had been concerned with the actions of al-Muhallabī, who by his attacks harassed the government troops stationed there and established his domination over most of the districts of al-Ahwāz. Abū al-'Abbās had already gone on before him on this journey of his.

When Abū Aḥmad arrived in Bardūdā, he remained for several days, and issued instructions to prepare everything he needed for a cavalry march to the districts of al-Ahwāz. He sent people ahead to repair the roads and residences, and to store up provisions for the troops accompanying him. Just before his departure from Wāsiṭ, Zīrak arrived on his way back from Ṭahīthā, where the population of the districts once occupied by the Zanj were back (in their places) and living securely. Abū Aḥmad instructed him to get ready and to bring his best and most valiant men, as well as the barges and galleys down to the Blind Tigris. They were to join forces with Abū Ḥamzah in order to reconnoiter the Tigris, pursue the Zanj fugitives, and attack such troops of the profligate as they might come upon along the route to the latter's city on the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. If they thought it a proper place for battle, they were to fight the profligate in his city and to report to Abū Aḥmad, so that he might further instruct them how to proceed. Abū Aḥmad appointed his son Hārūn as his deputy over the people he left behind at his camp in Wāsiṭ and decided to depart with a mobile group of his officers and troops. He did this after having forwarded an order to his son Hārūn. The latter was to have the troops and boats which Abū Aḥmad had left behind set course for a base on the Tigris. This was to occur as soon as word to this effect was received from Abū Aḥmad.

[1974] On the first of Jumādā II, 267 (January 7, 881), Abū Aḥmad left Wāsiṭ bound for Al-Ahwāz and its districts. (En route) he camped at Bādhibān,[59] Jūkā,[60] al-Ṭīb,[61] Qurqūb,[62] and Darustān. Next he stopped at Wādī al-Sūs where a pontoon bridge had been placed across the water for him.[63] He stayed from morning to late afternoon until all his men had crossed the waterway. Then he continued his march until he arrived at al-Sūs and camped there. Before that, he had sent an order to Masrūr, his governor in al-Ahwāz, to come to him. Masrūr met him with his troops and officers the day after Abū Aḥmad stopped at al-Sūs. Abū Aḥmad gave him and his men robes of honor, and stayed for three days.

Among the profligate's companions at Ṭahīthā was Aḥmad b. Mūsā b. Sa'īd al-Baṣrī, who was known as al-Qalūṣ. The latter was one of his adjutants and one of his earliest followers. He was captured after being severely injured, and he died of his wounds. Abū Aḥmad ordered his head cut off and displayed on the Wāsiṭ Bridge.

Among the prisoners taken that day was 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Hishām al-Kirmānī. The abominable one, having forced al-Kirmānī to come to him, sent him to Ṭahīthā, putting him in charge of the judiciary and worship there. In addition, many choice black troops were captured, men of courage and valor. When the abominable one learned about their fate, his control began to come apart and he lost his ability (to act wisely). In a fit of anxiety, he sent a letter with a companion of his to al-Muhallabī, who, at the time, was positioned in al-Ahwāz with some thirty thousand men. The letter contained an order to abandon all the provisions and equipment that 'Alī had and to proceed to him (that is, to the abominable one).

Al-Muhallabī received the letter having already learned [1975] about the march of Abū Aḥmad to al-Ahwāz and its districts. As a result, he lost his senses and left everything he had at his disposal to Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd al-Karnabā'ī, whom

59. Ibid., 82.
60. Ibid., 42.
61. Ibid., 64, 82, 241, 247.
62. Ibid., 241, 246.
63. Ibid., 233.

he appointed as his deputy. Muḥammad became seized with fear, abandoned everything that had been entrusted to him and followed al-Muhallabī. At the time, large quantities of various kinds of grain, dates and livestock were stored in Jubbā, in al-Ahwāz, and the areas surrounding it. All this they gave up.

The profligate wrote also to Bahbūdh b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb, who was at the time his governor of al-Fandam, and al-Bāsiyān, and the surrounding villages between al-Ahwāz and Fārs.[64] Bahbūdh was stationed in al-Fandam. The profligate ordered him to come (to his camp), whereupon Bahbūdh abandoned huge quantities of wheat and dates which he had at his disposal. Abū Aḥmad seized all of this, strengthening himself thereby and weakening the profligate.

When al-Muhallabī departed from al-Ahwāz, his men scattered about the villages between the city and the abominable one's camp, plundering them and banishing their inhabitants, even though the latter were at peace with the rebels. Many cavalry and infantry of al-Muhallabī failed to join him and remained behind in the districts of al-Ahwāz. Having heard about the pardon granted to those of the abominable one's men who had fallen into captivity in the region of Ṭahīthā, they wrote to Abū Aḥmad requesting him to take them under his protection. Meanwhile, al-Muhallabī and those of his troops who followed him reached the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal.[65]

That which had induced the profligate to order al-Muhallabī and Bahbūdh to march to him hastily was his apprehension lest Abū Aḥmad and his troops reach him in his present state. That is, he would reach him at a time when his own men were [1976] stricken with terror and weariness, while al-Muhallabī and Bahbūdh and their troops were cut off from him. But things did not turn out as he had reckoned.

Abū Aḥmad stayed as long as it was necessary to take over everything left by al-Muhallabī and Bahbūdh, to open the dams which the abominable one had erected on the Tigris, and to repair the highways and roads. Then he left al-Sūs and went to

64. Ibid., 242, 243, 247.
65. Ibid., 48.

Jundaysābūr,[66] where he stayed for three days. Since the army was short of fodder, he sent out men to look for it and bring it in. Thereupon he departed from Jundaysābūr and went to Tustar where he ordered that the taxes from the districts of al-Ahwāz be collected, sending to every district an officer to speed the delivery of the money. He sent off Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh to Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Kurdī—al-Kurdī was afraid that the troops of the abominable one might reach him before Abū Aḥmad reached the territory of al-Ahwāz. Abū Aḥmad instructed the former to treat Muḥammad al-Kurdī kindly, and to let him known that Abū Aḥmad was determined to forgive him and to exonerate him from his errors. Al-Kurdī was to come forward with the money quickly and to proceed to Sūq al-Ahwāz. Abū Aḥmad commanded Maṣrur al-Balkhī, his governor of al-Ahwāz, to send all his mawlās, pages, and regular troops so that he might inspect them, pay them their allotments and urge them on to fight against the abominable one. This, Masrūr did, and his troops were inspected one by one and given their pay.

Abū Aḥmad then left for 'Askar Mukram, where he set up his temporary quarters. From there he went to al-Ahwāz, seeing that the provisions which his troops were transporting would reach al-Ahwāz before his arrival. But he miscalculated this time, and his men became greatly agitated. He spent three days expecting the food to arrive, and still it did not come. Conditions grew bad and dissension broke out among the troops. Then, Abū Aḥmad made an inquiry into the reasons for the delay, and found that the troops had ruined an ancient Per- [1977]
sian bridge, called Qanṭarat Arbuk,[67] which was between Sūq al-Ahwāz and Rāmhurmuz. This had blocked the way for the merchants and those who were transporting the food, preventing them from going further. Abū Aḥmad set out for that bridge, which was two farsakhs (twelve km) from Sūq al-Ahwāz. Gathering the black soldiers who remained in his camp, he ordered them to carry rocks and stones to repair it. He paid them generously and did not leave the spot until the bridge was repaired and restored completely that same day. Then the people took the bridge route, and the caravans with the food arrived. The army was resuscitated and conditions improved.

66. Ibid., 237, 238, 247.
67. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1835.

Abū Aḥmad now ordered that boats be assembled and put together to span the Dujayl.[68] The boats were gathered from the districts of al-Ahwāz and the bridge building began. Abū Aḥmad remained in al-Ahwāz several days until his troops put their affairs in order and repaired the necessary equipment. He also waited for their animals to round into good shape, thus making up for the suffering caused by the delay in the supply of fodder. Meanwhile, messages reached al-Muwaffaq from al-Muhallabī's men who had deserted. They remained in the area of Sūq al-Ahwāz and were now requesting guarantees of safe conduct from al-Muwaffaq. This being granted, about one thousand men came to him. Abū Aḥmad treated them kindly, assigned them to officers of his pages and allotted them military pay.

Now, when the Dujayl bridge was tied,[69] Abū Aḥmad sent his troops across, then he himself followed, and established his camp on the western bank of the river in the place called Qaṣr al-Ma'mūn.[70] He remained for three days. One night there was a terrible earthquake, May God preserve us from its evil and save us from its adversity! Before crossing the bridge over the Dujayl, Abū Aḥmad sent his son Abū al-'Abbās to the place where [1978] he planned to camp in the area of the Blind Tigris. This was the place known as the Nahr al-Mubārak of Furāt al-Baṣrah.[71] He wrote to his son Hārūn to go there, as well, with all the troops

68. That is, the Dujayl which was known as the Dujayl of al-Ahwāz. It was better known as the Kārūn. See Le Strange, Lands, index, 524.

69. It was a pontoon bridge (jisr), and hence portable.

70. Not to be confused with any of the palaces of that name in Baghdad. See Lassner, Topography, index, 321.

71. Presumably the canal leading to al-Mubārak, a town which lay on the western side of the Tigris in the general vicinity of the fighting. See Le Strange, Lands, 38. Note that Yāqūt also mentions a canal of this name located in the Baṣrah region. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 408–409. Furāt al-Baṣrah was, however, an administrative region (kūrah) in Sassanian times, op. cit, III, 863.

that had been left behind with him, so that the armies would gather there.

Abū Aḥmad departed from Qaṣr al-Ma'mūn and, when he stopped at Qūraj al-'Abbās, he was met by Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh, who brought him word about the settlement with Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh, as well as presents from the latter, such as animals and beasts trained for the hunt, and other things. At this, he departed from al-Qūraj and next stopped at Ja'fariyyah.[72] There was no water in this village exccept for the wells which Abū Aḥmad had dug earlier in his camp. He had sent Sa'd al-Aswad, the mawlā of 'Ubaydallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Ammār from Qūraj al-'Abbās to do the job, and the wells were dug. Abū Aḥmad stayed at this place for a full day. He came upon stored-up provisions which the troops found more than sufficient for their needs and they partook of them. From there they went to the place called al-Bushīr, where they found a pool of rainwater. Abū Aḥmad stayed there for a day and a night, then late in the night they departed bound for Nahr al-Mubārak. After a rather long and strenous march, they arrived there after the midday prayer. On the way, Abū Aḥmad was met and welcomed by his two sons, Abū al-'Abbās and Hārūn,and they accompanied him on his journey until reaching Nahr al-Mubārak. This was on a Saturday, in the middle of Rajab, 267 (February 5–March 6, 881).

Meanwhile, between Abū Aḥmad's departure from Wāsiṭ and his arrival at Nahr al-Mubārak, Zīrak, Nuṣayr and their men carried out an impressive action, fulfilling their task of pursuing the Zanj fugitives from Ṭahīthā. (According to) Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan—Muḥammad b. Ḥammād: When Zīrak and Nuṣayr met on the Blind Tigris they marched together until they reached al-Ubullah, where one of the abominable one's men asked for a guarantee of safe-conduct. He informed the two of them that the abominable one had sent out a great number of galleys, skiffs (zawraq) and boats (ṣalghah) loaded with Zanj under the command of one of his lieutenants, Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm. The latter's patronymic was Abū 'Īsā. This [1979]

72. Not to be confused with the various places of this name mentioned in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 88.

Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, who hailed from al-Baṣrah, had been brought to the abominable one at the time al-Baṣrah was destroyed by a Zanj officer named Yasār. Yasār had been in charge of the profligate's security force. This Baṣran served Yasār as his scribe until the latter died. Meanwhile Aḥmad b. Mahdī al-Jubbā'ī prospered under the abominable one, who appointed him governor over most of his districts. This Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm was assigned to him and served as his scribe until al-Jubbā'ī perished.

Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm coveted the latter's rank and desired that the abominable one arrange for him to replace al-Jubbā'ī. He thus forsook the ink and the pen and took to arms, applying himself exclusively to military affairs. At this juncture the abominable one sent him out with these troops, ordering him to take up positions across the Tigris in order to repel any (enemy) force which might arrive. At times Muḥammad stayed on the Tigris, and at times he went out with his men to the waterway known as Nahr Yazīd.[73] Among these troops of his were Shibl b. Sālim and 'Amr, who was known as Ghulām Būdhā, the most valiant of his black troops and others. One man from this force surrendered to Zīrak and Nuṣayr and informed them of Muḥammad's designs. He told them that Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm had targeted the area of Nuṣayr's camp—Nuṣayr was, at the time, stationed at Nahr al-Mar'ah.[74] He told them that Muḥammad and his troops were intending to pass along the [1980] waterways which cross Nahr Ma'qil[75] and Bathq Shīrīn in order to reach the place known as al-Shurṭah[76] so as to emerge from behind and flank Nuṣayr's army. No sooner did this news reach Nuṣayr, than he hurriedly left al-Ubullah for his camp. At the same time, Zīrak took off for Bathq Shīrīn and appeared from behind him at a place called al-Mīshān, thinking that Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm and his men would go to Nuṣayr's camp along this course. It was as he had surmised, and he encoun-

73. It is possible that this is the Nahr Yazīd in the area of al-Baṣrah mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 846.

74. An ancient canal in the Baṣrah area. See Yārūt, Mu'jam, IV, 844.

75. Ibid., 845.

76. A large village between al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 275.

tered them on the way. After he had gone through violent battle, God granted him the upper hand, and the enemy (forces) were routed. They escaped to a canal where an ambush of theirs had been prepared—this was the Nahr Yazīd. However, Zīrak was guided there, and his galleys and barges deeply penetrated their positions. Some of the enemy (troops) were killed, some were captured. Among the captured were Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, whose patronymic was Abū 'Īsā, and 'Amr, who was called Ghulām Būdhā. They were seized along with some thirty galleys. Shibl and the others who escaped fled to the abominable one's camp. Victorious, Zīrak left Bathq Shīrīn, taking along the captives, the severed hands of the dead, and the galleys, skiffs and other boats that he had seized. Zīrak thus made his way from the Blind Tigris to Wāsiṭ, and wrote to Abū Aḥmad about the battle, the victory, and the (ultimate) conquest.

As a result of Zīrak's action, all the partisans of the profligate that were in the districts along the Tigris were filled with fear. It is said that about two thousand men requested guarantees of safe-conduct from Abū Ḥamzah, while he was stationed at Nahr al-Mar'ah. Abū Ḥamzah wrote of this to Abū Muḥammad, and the latter instructed Zīrak to receive them and confirm their safe conduct. Moreover, he was to grant them a military allotment, integrate them with his own troops and use them against the enemy. [1981]

Zīrak remained in Wāsiṭ up to the time a dispatch arrived from Abū Aḥmad, ordering his son Hārūn to march to Nahr al-Mubārak with the troops that had remained with him; Zīrak then went with Hārūn. Abū Aḥmad now wrote to Nuṣayr, who was stationed at Nahr al-Mar'ah, ordering the latter to come to him at Nahr al-Mubārak. Abū Aḥmad then met him there.

In going to Nahr al-Mubārak, Abū al-'Abbās advanced with his barges and galleys to the camp of the profligate. He then attacked him in his city on the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. The battle between the two forces raged from early morning to late afternoon. One of the abominable one's officers called Muntāb, who had been attached to Sulaymān b. Jāmi', asked Abū al-'Abbās for a guarantee of safe-conduct. With him were a contingent of his men. This defection was the kind of thing that shattered the abominable one and his army. Abū al-'Abbās withdrew with booty. He clothed Muntāb with robes of honor, treated him generously, and gave him a mount to ride. When Abū al-'Abbās reached his father, he told him about Muntāb, and how he had come to him, asking for guarantees of safe-conduct. At this, Abū Aḥmad also ordered robes of honor for Muntāb, as well as presents and a mount to ride. Muntāb was the first of the Zanj officers to seek a guarantee of safe-conduct.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Sahl—Muḥammad b. Ḥammād b. Isḥāq b. Ḥammād b. Zayd: When Abū Aḥmad reached Nahr al-Mubārak on a Saturday, in the middle of Rajab, 267 (February 5–March 6, 881), the first thing he reportedly did concerning the abominable one was to write him a letter calling upon him to repent and return to God Almighty and to desist from bloodshed and crimes. He was to stop [1982] devastating regions and centers of population, and desist from rape and the violation of property. Moreover, he was to stop boasting that he was a prophet or apostle—an honor which God had not bestowed upon him. In addition, he informed him that he would extend him forgiveness and guarantees of safe-conduct if he would desist from those actions which God abhors. If he would but join the community of the Muslims, all his grave crimes of the past would be forgotten and he would earn for himself a life of plenty.

He forwarded this letter to the abominable one by way of his (that is, Abū Aḥmad's) messenger. The latter tried to deliver it, but was prevented from doing so by the abominable one's men. So, the messenger threw the letter to them, and they presented it to the abominable one who read it. The warning contained in the message did nothing but augment his hatred and obstinacy. He gave no reply at all, and persisted in his errors. The messenger returned to Abū Aḥmad, reported his action and the abominable one's refusal to reply to the letter.

Now, from Saturday through Wednesday, Abū Aḥmad was busy inspecting the barges and galleys, assigning to them his officers, clients and pages, and selecting archers for the vessels. On Thursday, Abū Aḥmad and his men, accompanied by his son Abū al-'Abbās, set out by the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal for the city of the abominable one, which the latter had named al-

Mukhtārah.[77] Abū Aḥmad observed the city, and studied its defenses and fortifications, including the walls and surrounding moats. He studied the barricaded roads leading to it, the array of ballistas, catapults, and Nawukiyyah bows and other equipment on the city walls. The likes of these he had never seen in any previous revolt against the central authorities. Seeing the arrayed multitudes of enemy warriors, he realized how difficult his task was. When the abominable one's troops saw Abū Aḥmad, they raised their voices so that the earth trembled. [1983]

Abū Aḥmad instructed his son, Abū al-'Abbās to proceed to the walls of the city and shower the defenders with arrows; this he did. He moved so close to the city that his barges struck the quay of the profligate's fortress. The profligate's (troops) rushed to the spot where the barges approached. The enemy banded together and hurled a succession of arrows and stones from their ballistas, catapults and slings, while the rank and file threw stones with their hands until there was no spot at which an observer from the barges could glance without seeing an arrow or a stone. Abū al-'Abbās endured all this, and the profligate and his companions saw the government force displaying perseverance and zeal such as no one fighting against them had ever done. Then Abū Aḥmad ordered Abū al-'Abbās and his men to return to their positions in order to rest and attend to their wounds; this they did.

At this point, two of the troops from the galleys asked Abū Aḥmad for guarantees of safe-conduct and they brought him their boat with its equipment and sailors. Abū Aḥmad ordered that brocade robes of honor and jewel-bedecked belts and other gifts be bestowed upon them. At his command, their sailors were given robes of red silk and white garments; all were showered with generous gifts. In this way Abū Aḥmad won their sympathy; then he posted them in a place from which they could be seen by their former comrades. This was the most humilitating stratagem ever employed against the profligate. For, when the remaining Zanj saw how their companions had been pardoned and granted kindness, they too wished eagerly for safe-conduct. They then rushed towards Abū Aḥmad, desir-

77. On the seige of al-Mukhtārah, see Popovic Révolte, 134 ff.

[1984] ing to obtain what he had made available for the others. On that day, a number of troops from the galleys went over to Abū Aḥmad, and upon his order they all received the same treatment as their predecessors. When the abominable one saw that the troops from his galleys were inclined to surrender and were seizing every opportunity to do so, he ordered all of them to return from the Tigris to Nahr Abī al-Khaṣīb; at the mouth of this canal he placed men to prevent their leaving. At this, he had the barges brought forward, for which purpose he summoned Bahbūdh b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb, one of his most loyal champions; the latter had under his command the largest and the best equipped vessels. Bahbūdh and his men responded to this call. It happened to be full tide, and the barges of Abū Aḥmad were dispersed. Abū Ḥamzah with his ships clung to the eastern bank of the Tigris. Establishing his position there, he felt that the fight was over and he was no longer needed. But when Bahbūdh and his barges appeared, Abū Aḥmad ordered Abū Ḥamzah to advance with his barges; he also ordered Abū al-'Abbās to attack Bahbūdh with his vessels, while sending word to the officers and pages to attack with him. Twelve barges, manned by the officers and pages who were with Abū al-'Abbās and Zīrak, bore the brunt of the battle. As the battle flared, the abominable one's men chose to attack Abū al-'Abbās and his force, for they had only a few barges. However, when the Zanj were confronted with a counter-attack and put to flight, Abū al-'Abbās and his men turned to chase Bahbūdh, whom they drove to an enclosure near the abominable one's fortress. Bahbūdh suffered two lance thrusts and received many arrow wounds; his limbs were badly injured by stones. But his men saved him, for they protected him until he reached [1985] Abū al-Khaṣīb; thus he narrowly escaped death. Among the officers who were with him and were slain that day was one called 'Amīrah, a man brave and valiant, who was always in the forefront of the battle. The men of Abū al-'Abbās seized one of Bahbūdh's barges whose men had been killed or drowned. The ship was taken and, in accordance with Abū Aḥmad's instructions, Abū al-'Abbās and his men set their ships toward the eastern bank of the Tigris as the force withdrew.

When the profligate perceived that Abū Aḥmad's force was withdrawing, he ordered those who had fled in their barges to Nahr Abū al-Khaṣīb, to come forward so as to allay his men's fear by creating an impression of an orderly retreat and not a flight in defeat. At this, Abū Aḥmad quickly instructed some of his pages to turn the fore of their barges toward them in pursuit. No sooner did the Zanj see this than they fled in great panic. One of their barges remained behind and the troops in it asked Abū Aḥmad for guarantees of safe-conduct. Displaying a white flag that they had, the Zanj came to him in their barge and were granted safe-conduct. They were given various presents and garments. This induced the profligate to order the Zanj barges brought back into the canal and to bar their exit from it. Since it was near the end of the day, Abū Aḥmad ordered his men to return to their camp at the Nahr al-Mubārak. On that day, during his withdrawal, a great many of the Zanj and others sought guarantees of safety from Abū Aḥmad. He welcomed them and had them transported on his barges and galleys. Then he ordered robes of honor for them, as well as various presents, and their names were inscribed in the registers of Abū al-'Abbās's troops.

Abū Aḥmad went to his camp, which he reached after the late evening prayer. He stayed there during Friday, Saturday [1986] and Sunday, and then decided to transfer his camp to a place which would be nearer for him to carry on the campaign against the abominable one. On Monday, the twenty-fourth of Rajab, 267 (February 28, 881), Abū Aḥmad together with Abū al-'Abbās, his clients, pages and officers—among them Zīrak and Nuṣayr—boarded barges and sailed until they reached the waterway called Nahr Jaṭṭa,[78] east of the Tigris. It was opposite the canal called Nahr al-Yahūdī.[79] He stopped there, made whatever arrangements he felt were necessary, and then pushed on, leaving behind Abū al-'Abbās, Nuṣayr and Zīrak. Abū Aḥmad 78. One of the canals of the Baṣrah area. Its banks were heavily settled. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 837.

79. This does not seem to be the Yahūdī Canal which was in the vicinity of Sāmarrā. See Le Strange, Lands, 58. I have found no reference to this particular waterway.

returned to his camp, and upon his command, it was announced among the men that they were going to journey to the place he had chosen on the Jaṭṭā Canal. After the roads were put in good order for the tranport animals and the bridges on the canals were secured, he moved out, with the animals in the lead. Early on the morning of Tuesday, the twenty-fifth of Rajab (March 1, 881), he and all his troops travelled to Nahr Jaṭṭā and set up camp there.

They remained there until Saturday, the fourteenth of Sha'bān, 267 (March 21, 881), having engaged in no combat. It was only on that day that Abū Aḥmad set out with his infantry and cavalry—he took along all his horsemen. He put the infantry men and the volunteers—every one of them in uniform and breastplate—aboard vessels and barges, and journeyed to the Euphrates, reaching a place opposite the profligate's camp. At the time, Abū Aḥmad had fifty thousand or more troops and auxiliaries, while the profligate had some three hundred thousand, all of whom were active warriors or defenders, such as [1987] swordsmen, lancers, archers, sling-shooters and artillerymen for the catapults and ballistas. The weakest were charged with flinging stones by hand, and, as assembled onlookers, they added to the tumult by screaming and shouting, a task shared by the women.

Abū Aḥmad remained opposite the profligate's camp until late in the morning, when, at his command, heralds cried out that guarantees of safe-conduct were being offered to everyone without discrimination, except for the abominable one. He then called for arrows upon which were fastened sheets containing the text of the guarantees which had been announced. In it he promised to treat kindly those people (who surrendered). The sheets were then shot into the abominable one's camp. Now, the hearts of the heretics were swerving towards Abū Aḥmad out of awe and eagerness for the good-will and pardon which he had promised them. A great many of them came to him on that day, carried by barges; whereupon, he presented them with various gifts. Abū Aḥmad then returned to his encampment on the Jaṭṭā Canal, and no fighting took place that day. Two of his mawlā officers, one of them Buktimur and the other Ja'far b. Yaghla'uz, arrived with all their troops, strengthening the forces with Abū Aḥmad. Abū Aḥmad departed from the Jaṭṭa Canal to an encampment which he had prepared in advance. He constructed bridges along its waterways and had the river spanned so that the camp could expand to Furāt al-Baṣrah, opposite the city of the profligate. It was on a Sunday, in the middle of Sha'bān, 267 (March 7–April 4, 881), that Abū Aḥmad settled at this encampment; he made it his base and positioned himself there, assigning his officers and commanders to their various positions. He placed Nuṣayr, the commander of the barges and galleys, together with his troops, in the first range of the camp, whose outer limit was a place directly opposite the waterway known as Nahr Juwayy Kūr. [1988] Zīrak al-Turkī, the commander of the vanguard of Abū al-'Abbās, was assigned with his troops to a position opposite the area between the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, which is also known as Nahr al-Atrāk, and the waterway known as Nahr al-Mughīrah. Zīrak was followed by Abū Aḥmad's chamberlain (ḥājib), Ya'lā b. Juhistār, and his troops. The tents of Abū Aḥmad and his two sons were in front of Dayr Jābīl.[80] Abū Aḥmad sent his client Rāshid at the head of his (Abū Aḥmad's) clients and his pages down to the waterway called Nahr al-Maṭmah—his pages consisted of Turks, Khazars, men from al-Rūm, Daylam, Ṭabaristān, the Maghrib and Zanzibar. He placed his wazīr Sā'id b. Makhlad with a force of clients and page above Rāshid's force, and sent Masrūr al-Balkhī with his troops down to the waterway called Nahr Sindādān. Similarly, he sent al-Faḍl and Muḥammad, the sons of Mūsā b. Bughā, with their armies down to the waterway known as Nahr Hālah. These two were followed by Mūsā Dāljawayh with his soldiers and officers. Bughrāj al-Turkī was assigned to the rearguard camped at the Jaṭṭa Canal. In this way they established their base camp and remained there.

Now, observing the position of the abominable one, his fortifications and the vastness of the army, Abū Aḥmad realized that he must wear him out in a long siege and bring about a split among his troops by offering good-will to those who would turn away from their master, and by treating harshly those who stuck to their errors. He further realized that he needed more barges and other equipment for river fighting. He [1989] therefore sent agents to collect provisions and let them come by land and water to his camp in the city which he named al-Muwaffaqiyyah. He wrote to the governors of the surrounding districts to bring the money to his treasury in this city. He also sent a messenger to Sīrāf[81] and Jannābā[82] about building the numerous barges which he needed in order to post them where they could cut off the flow of provisions to the traitor and his cohort. He also wrote to his governors in the surrounding districts to dispatch to him anyone fit and willing so that they might be inscribed on his roll. Then he spent a month or so waiting. Provisions kept on arriving regularly, transport after transport, and the merchants provided various kinds of wares and produce for the city of al-Muwaffaqiyyah. Markets sprang up in that city, and the number of merchants and contractors from every land grew in number. After more than ten years of brigandage on the waterways by the profligate and his men, boats began to arrive again.

80. In the Baṣrah region. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 650.

Abū Aḥmad built a Friday Mosque and ordered the people to worship there; then he established mints that issued gold and silver coins. Various resources and amenities were concentrated in Abū Aḥmad's city, and its inhabitants missed nothing that was available in the older cities. Money flowed into it and pay was distributed on time. As the situation improved, people lived in comfort, and everyone was eager to travel to the city of al-Muwaffaqiyyah and stay there.

[1990] Two days after Abū Aḥmad's arrival in al-Muwaffaqiyyah, the abominable one ordered Bahbūdh b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb (to attack). He crossed (the water) to the edge of Abū Ḥamzah's camp, catching the troops in the galleys unaware. Bahbūdh charged Abū Ḥamzah and killed many of his men, capturing many others. He set fire to the reed huts they had put up before buildings were erected there. At this, Abū Aḥmad instructed Nuṣayr to rally all his men and to grant no one leave from the camp. He also ordered him to use his barges, galleys, skiffs, and infantry to guard the perimeter of his camp up to the outer reaches of Māyān Rūdhān,[83] al-Qindal[84] and Abrusān, and to engage whatever troops the profligate had there.

81. The great seaport of the Persian Gulf. See Le Strange, Lands, index, 530.
82. Ibid., index, 509.

At Māyān Rūdhān was one of the profligate's officers, an Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Hamdānī along with four thousand Zanj; and in al-Qindal, Muḥammad b. Abān, who was known as Abū al-Ḥasān, the brother of 'Alī b. Abān, was stationed with three thousand men. Similarly, the one known as al-Dūr was stationed in Abrusān with a force of fifteen hundred, made up of Zanj and men of al-Jubbā'ī's contingent.

Abū al-'Abbās opened operations with an attack on al-Hamdānī. In a series of engagements, al-Hamdānī lost many men who were killed or captured.He himself escaped in a galley he had held ready and reached the brother of al-Muhallabī, the one whose patronymic was Abū al-Ḥāsan. The troops of Abū al-'Abbās took hold of everything the Zanj had in their possession and transported it to their camp. Abū Aḥmad had sent word to his son to grant safe-conduct to everyone appealing for it and to treat kindly all who came out to him. A band of Zanj deserted Alī b. Abān, seeking guarantees of safe-conduct and Abū al-'Abbās granted them their request. Then he sent them to his father, who ordered robes of honor an gifts for everyone of them according to their personal merits. He also ordered that [1991] they be placed opposite the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal so that their (former) compatriots could see them. Thus, Abū Aḥmad continued to trap the traitor, granting safe-conduct to all Zanj and others deserting him, and besieging and blockading the rest by cutting off their supplies and necessities.

The provisions from al-Ahwāz and the various kinds of merchandise from it, its districts, and the surrounding areas that fell under the jurisdiction of its officials, used to come along the waterway known as Nahr Bayān. Bahbūdh once got wind of a caravan with a variety of merchandise and food, so with a select team he set out one night to a palm grove and lay there in wait. As the caravan, unaware of the ambush, was passing,

83. See Yāqūt Mu'jam, IV, 708–709.
84. A place situated in the Baṣrah region. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 183.

Bahbūdh fell upon it, killing some and capturing others while seizing goods to his heart's content. Abū Aḥmad had dispatched with the caravan an officer with a convoy of troops to guard it, but they were unable to do so, because of the size of Bahbūdh's force and the terrain which was unfavorable for the use of cavalry that was indispensible.

When word of this reached Abū Aḥmad, he was shocked by the losses in money, men and goods, and he gave instructions to compensate the men in full. He now posted barges at the mouth of the Bayān and other canals, places which could not be reached by horsemen. He also ordered that additional barges be built and sent to him, and a goodly number of them arrived. He manned them and put them under the command of his son, Abū al-'Abbās, instructing him to take care of every spot through which provisions could flow to the profligate (forces). For this purpose Abū al-'Abbās, sailed with his barges to the mouth of the sea, placing officers on all the roads. Having done so, he fully acquitted himself of this task.

In Ramaḍān (April 5–May 4, 881) a battle took place be-[1992] tween Isḥāq b. Kundāj, and Isḥāq b. Ayyūb, 'Īsā b. al-Shaykh, Abū al-Maghrā', Ḥamdān al-Shārī and the tribes of Rabī'ah, Taghlib, Bakr and Yaman that were connected with them. Ibn Kundāj routed them and chased them to Naṣībīn and beyond there to the vicinity of Āmid. He seized their possessions and they camped at Āmid. Further engagements ensued.

In this month Ṣandal al-Zinjī was killed. The reason for his being killed (is as follows). On the second of Ramaḍān, 267 (April 6, 881) troops of the abominable one reportedly made their way toward the camps of Nuṣayr and Zīrak with the intention of attacking them; but warned by people, Nuṣayr and Zīrak gave battle and, driving the Zanj back, they took Ṣandal prisoner. They say, this Ṣandal used to unveil the faces and heads of free-born Muslim women and treat them as if they were handmaids. And if one would resist, he would strike her in the face and pass her to some savage Zanj for a very low price. When he was delivered to Abū Aḥmad, the latter ordered him tied, and in his presence the man was ordered pierced with arrows and killed.

In Ramaḍān, (April 5–May 4, 881) a great many of the Zanj requested safe-conduct from Abū Aḥmad.

The Reason for These Requests

It is reported that Muhadhdhab, one of the abominable one's most prominent followers, and a leading and courageous figure among them, sought a guarantee of safe-conduct from Abū Aḥmad. A barge brought him to Abū Aḥmad while the latter was breaking his fast. Muhadhdhab reported that he came [1993] bearing good advice and seeking safety, and indicated that at that very moment the Zanj were on their way to Abū Aḥmad's camp in order to attack him by night. For this purpose the profligate had summoned his most valiant men. At this, Abū Aḥmad gave an order to send barges arrayed with a force to combat the Zanj and prevent their passage. When the Zanj perceived that their plan was disclosed, they withdrew in panic and scores of Zanj and others surrendered and continued to do so. By the end of Ramaḍān, 267, (April 5–May 4, 881) the number of people, white and black, who arrived at the camp of Abū Aḥmad reached five thousand.

In Shawwāl (May 5–June 2, 881), news arrived that al-Khujustānī had entered Naysābūr and that 'Amr b. al-Layth and his men had fled. The former had treated the people there harshly; he demolished the houses of the Mu'ādh b. Muslim's clan, and killed those of its members who fell into his hands. Their estates were given to others as fiefs. He eliminated the name of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir from the sermons in the pulpits of the cities which he seized in Khurāsān, and had the people pledge allegiance only to himself and to al-Mu'tamid, leaving out all others.

In Shawwāl, (May 5–June 2, 881) Abū al-'Abbās engaged in a fight with the Zanj, and inflicted heavy losses upon them.

The Reason For This Fight

According to information which reached me, the profligate selected from all his troops, men of courage and valor, and in-[1994] structed al-Muhallabī to cross (the waterway) with them for a night raid on the camp of Abū Aḥmad. This he did.

The number of the Zanj and others who crossed the water was about five thousand, mostly blacks, among them some two hundred officers. They crossed to the eastern side of the Tigris, and decided that some of their forces should go behind the palm grove near the lagoon, so as to be in the rear of Abū Aḥmad's army. A large detachment was to pass with barges, galleys and ferries in front of Abū Aḥmad's camp. Should fighting break out between the two forces, the abominable one's commanders who reached the lagoon were to attack the camp of Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq with great vigor, surprising him and his men in the midst of battle.

The rebels counted on the success of this scheme. Their troops stayed all night on the Euphrates[85] in order to attack the army at the break of day. But a young sailor from their ranks sought safety from Abū Aḥmad and disclosed to him the plan which the rebels had conceived against him. Abū Aḥmad instructed Abū al-'Abbās and the officers and pages to set out for the area of the abominable one's troops. He dispatched a group of officers from among his pages with cavalry to the lagoon behind the palm grove on the Euphrates, in order to cut off the enemy's retreat to the lagoon. The men of the barges and galleys were instructed to block the Tigris, while the infantry were ordered to move toward the enemy from the palm grove.

When, contrary to their expectations, the rebels became aware of these measures taken against them, they fled along the same way they had come, and sought safety in the direc-
[1995] tion of Jawwīth Bārūbah.[86] Informed of their retreat, al-Muwaffaq instructed Abū al-'Abbās and Zīrak to go with their barges and reach the river before the Zanj so as to prevent them from crossing. He instructed one of his pages—he was called

85. Presumably where the river turns into The Great Swamp.

86. The text reads: Barawayh; it should read: Bārūbah, as in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 163. The latter indicates it to be a town in the Baṣrah region opposite al-Uballah.

Thābit—who had under his command an extensive force of black pages, to transport his men with bridging equipment and skiffs to the place where the enemies of God were positioned in order to attack them in place. Thābit overtook the Zanj at Jawwīth Bārūbah and attacked them. He engaged them in sustained combat, but the Zanj stood fast, and then pressed the attack against his combined force. His troops consisted of only some five hundred men because his contingent was not fully mobilized. The enemy sought them out, but then Thābit counterattacked them gallantly, forcing them back. God granted him the sight of them running away, bearing heavy losses in dead, wounded, and drowned; those who plunged into the water, relying upon their ability to swim, were picked up by the barges and galleys in the Tigris and the canal. Of this army, only a few escaped. Abū al-'Abbās and Thābit returned victorious. The heads of the killed were hung from the barges; similarly, the captives were crucified. They passed near the enemy city in order to terrify the compatriots of the dead and captured. Upon seeing this, the Zanj fell into despair and were seized by foreboding. After he had come with the prisoners and the heads into the city of al-Muwaffaqiyyah, Abū al-'Abbās heard that the leader of the Zanj was deluding his men with false stories that the heads displayed were only effigies to frighten them, and that the crucified captives were deserters who had surrendered to the government army. At this, al-Muwaffaq instructed Abū al-'Abbās to gather the heads and go with them in front of the profligate's fortress. He was then to hurl them into the latter's camp by means of a catapult at- [1996] tached to a vessel. This was done. Now, when the heads dropped into the Zanj city, the friends of the dead recognized the heads of their compatriots and broke out in tears. The lies and duplicity of the sinner thus became evident to all.

In Shawwāl, (May 5–June 2, 881) the troops of Ibn Abī al-Sāj fought with al-Hayṣam al-'Ijlī, destroying his vanguard; then they seized his camp and pillaged it.

In Dhū al-Qa'dah, (June 3–July 2, 881), Zīrak fought with troops of the leader of the Zanj at Nahr b. 'Umar and inflicted heavy losses upon them.

The Reason for This Engagement

It is reported that the leader of the Zanj ordered the procurement of barges. These were constructed for him and added to those used in military operations. He divided his barges into three groups led by Bahbūdh, Naṣr al-Rūmī and Aḥmad b. al-Zaranjī respectively. Each commander was made responsible for his group. There were some fifty barges to a squadron. He manned them with archers and lancers, and an effort was made to bring their equipment and arms into perfect condition. Then they were ordered to set out upon the Tigris, cross to the eastern side and challenge the troops of al-Muwaffaq in combat.

Al-Muwaffaq, at this time, had only a small number of barges, since not all that he had ordered prepared for him had arrived, and those which he had at his disposal were scattered about the mouth of the sea and mouths of the canals along which provisions flowed to the Zanj. The henchmen of the sinner went about their task brutally, and as a result, it was possible to seize one after another of al-Muwaffaq's barges. Nu-[1997] ṣayr, who was known as Abū Ḥamzah, at the time commanded the major part of al-Muwaffaq's barges; he refrained from engaging the enemy in combat or from advancing towards them, as he would otherwise have done, because the number of his barges was not sufficient. Therefore, people in al-Muwaffaq's camp were terrified, fearing that the Zanj with their superiority in barges might set out against them.

But at this juncture, barges which al-Muwaffaq had built in Jannābā arrived. Fearing the Zanj might intercept them on the Tigris, Abū Aḥmad instructed Abū al-'Abbās to set out with his barges to meet them and safely convey them to the camp. Abū al-'Abbās then brought these barges to Nuṣayr's camp.

When the Zanj noticed the barges, they were anxious to seize them. The abominable one ordered his barges and men out to challenge the enemy. The barges of Nuṣayr and Abū al-'Abbās went into action in an effort to cut them off.

One of Abū al-'Abbās's pages, a brave man called Waṣīf, who was known as al-Ḥijrā'ī, rushed forward with his barges and attacked the Zanj vigorously. They fled and he pursued them until he encountered them in the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, and was cut off from his force. The barges of the Zanj turned about to attack him, and he found himself in a grave situation. Some of the Zanj barges clung with their oars to the oars of Waṣīf's barge and pulled it toward the bank, while others surrounded him and his men from all sides. More Zanj rushed down from the walls, and although Waṣīf and his men fought vigorously, they were killed. Then the Zanj withdrew with their barges into the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. Abū al-'Abbās met the Jannābā barges that had arrived safely with their armament and men. Abū Aḥmad ordered Abū al-'Abbās to take complete command of all the military operations involving the barges, and cut off [1998] the flow of supplies to the enemy from any quarter; this he did.

The barges were outfitted and manned with the best archers and lancers. When everything was fully prepared, Abū al-'Abbās posted the vessels in places where the barges of the abominable one sought loot, following their usual pattern. Abū al-'Abbās set out against them with his barges and the other commanders were ordered to join him in the attack. This they did, penetrating the enemy formations, showering them with arrows and stones, and reaching them with lances. God smote the enemy who fled in panic, while Abū al-'Abbās and his men chased them, forcing them to seek refuge in the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. Three of their ships were sunk, and two others were captured with all their fighting men and sailors. At the order of Abū al-'Abbās, they were all beheaded. When the abominable one saw the fate of his men, he held his barges back in the enclosure of his fortress and forbade his men to sail them into the Tigris except when the river was free from al-Muwaffaq's vessels.

After Abū al-'Abbās had attacked them in this fashion, the panic among the Zanj increased and prominent companions of the abominable one sought to surrender. They were granted safe conduct. It is reported that among the prominent Zanj seeking safety was Muḥammad b. Ḥārith al-'Ammī, who was charged with defending the camp at Munkā and the walls close to the camp of al-Muwaffaq. He deserted at night with a number of his companions, and al-Muwaffaq received him with generous gifts, clothed him with robes of honor, and gave him a number of horses with harnesses and equipment. He also put [1999] him on the payroll. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥārith also attempted to take along his wife, who was his cousin, but the woman failed in her attempt to join him. Caught by the Zanj, she was returned to the abominable one, who kept her in jail for a time, then he had her auctioned off in the market and sold.

Among those seeking a guarantee of safe-conduct was Aḥmad, who was known as al-Bardha'ī. It is said that he was one of the most valiant companions of the abominable one and a close friend of al-Muhallabī. Among the Zanj commanders who sought safety were Madbad, Ibn Ankalawayh and Manīnah. They were all bestowed with robes of honor, and given numerous gifts and horses. All the soldiers who came with them were also accorded excellent treatment.

As the flow of provisions to the abominable one was cut off, and all the roads leading to him and his men were blocked, he instructed Shibl and Abū Nidā', two of his earliest followers—commanders upon whom he could rely and whose advice he trusted—to set out with ten thousand Zanj and others to the Dayr, Mar'ah and Abū al-Asad canals.[87] From there they were to go to the Great Swamp (al-Baṭīḥah)[88] to raid the Muslims, seize any provisions they might find, and cut off the provisions and other supplies flowing to the camp of al-Muwaffaq from Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) and Wāsiṭ and the surrounding areas. When news of their journey reached al-Muwaffaq, he summoned his client Zīrak, the commander of Abū al-'Abbās's vanguard, and instructed him to proceed against them with his troops. He also attached a select group of men to Zīrak's command.

Zīrak moved out quickly with his barges and galleys, and transported his infantry in skiffs and light vessels, reaching [2000] Nahr al-Dayr.[89] Having found no trace of the Zanj, he moved on to Bathq Shīrīn, and then worked his way along the 'Adī Canal.[90] When he came out to the Ibn 'Umar Canal,[91] he met up

87. See Le Strange, Lands, 26, 41, 42; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 839.
88. See Le Strange, Lands, 41.
89. See above, n. 87
90. See above, n. 88.
91. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 830.

with the Zanj force, the size of which terrified him. Zīrak implored God to help him against the Zanj, then charged upon them with the most seasoned and stalwart of his men. God cast terror into the hearts of the Zanj, and they collapsed under the blows of Zīrak's arms. An enormous number of them were killed, as many drowned and a great number of them were captured. Zīrak took hold of as many vessels as he could, and sank as many as he could. The number of vessels he seized reached about four hundred. He took the captives and the heads of the slain and proceeded to the camp of al-Muwaffaq.

On the twenty-third of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (July 26, 881), al-Muwaffaq himself crossed with his troops to the city of the profligate to fight him.

The Reason Why He Crossed Over to the Profligate

The reason for this was as follows: It is reported that when the commanders of the profligate's troops perceived the misfortune which had befallen them—death for those who emerged from the city (to fight), a harsh siege for those who had remained within its limits—none of them ventured out. And as they saw the excellent treatment accorded to those who sought safety from Abū Aḥmad and the pardon granted them, they too tended to surrender. They started to flee by every means possible. This filled the abominable one with terror and a certain feeling of his own doom.

In every sector where he suspected there was an escape route [2001] from his camp, he appointed guards and security men. He gave them the task of policing these areas and assigned men to the mouths of the canals to prevent boats from leaving. He was anxious to block any road, pass and opening so as to eliminate any temptation to leave his city.

A group of the deviate's commanders, that is, the leader of the Zanj, sent a message to al-Muwaffaq, requesting a guarantee of safe-conduct, and asking him to send out an army to fight the abominable one, so that they would have an opportunity to change allegiance. Then al-Muwaffaq instructed Abū al-ʿAbbās to go with a body of his troops to the place known as Nahr al-Gharbī, which was patrolled at the time by 'Alī b. Abān.

Abū al-'Abbās set out for Nahr al- Gharbī with a select force, taking with him barges, galleys and ferries. 'Alī b. al- Muhallabī and his men volunteered to go out against him and the two forces thus engaged in combat. Abū al-'Abbās's force gained the upper hand and subdued the enemy. The profligate sent Sulaymān b. Jāmi' to reinforce al-Muhallabī with a large contingent of Zanj. The battle continued that day from early in the morning into the late afternoon; the victory went to Abū al-'Abbās and his men. That group of the abominable one's commanders who had sought safe-conduct from Abū al-'Abbās came over to him now, joined by a great many Zanj horsemen and others. Abū al-'Abbās then ordered his troops to return to the barges and boats, and he left. On the way back he passed the city of the abominable one and reached the place known as Nahr al-Atrāk. His troops, noticing that there were few Zanj in that section of the canal, were tempted to attack and set off in the direction of the enemy—this was after the major part of the government troops had already withdrawn to al-Muwaffaqiyyah. They approached the bank, climbed up and quickly ad-[2002] vanced along the paths there. A group of them climbed the walls and came upon a small band of Zanj and their supporters. They killed those who came within their reach there. The profligate became aware of them, however, and bands of Zanj rallied to fight them, answering the call. When Abū al-'Abbās saw the growing concentration of the enemy against his small band of troops, he himself rushed back with his men from the barges to join them, while dispatching a message to al-Muwaffaq to send reinforcements. The latter immediately sent a force of pages to assist him; they came on barges and galleys. The pages gained the upper hand and put the Zanj to flight.

When Sulaymān b. Jāmi' noticed how Abū al-'Abbās's men were victorious over the Zanj, he rushed to the canal with a large body of troops, and travelled upstream until he reached the canal called Nahr 'Abdallāh. There he tracked the troops of Abū al-'Abbās, who were fighting the Zanj in front of them. As they were pursuing the fleeing Zanj, Sulaymān emerged behind them and beat his drums. At this, the troops of Abū al-'Abbās turned to flee, and the Zanj who were running away turned about. A detachment of al-Muwaffaq's pages and other units of his army were attacked, and the Zanj thus acquired a number of flags and spears. Abū al-'Abbās protected the rest of his men; most of them were unharmed and he withdrew with them. This skirmish encouraged the Zanj and their followers, and strengthened their spirits.

Again al-Muwaffaq resolved upon crossing with all his troops to fight against the abominable one. He instructed Abū al-'Abbās and the rest of the officers and pages to prepare for the crossing. He also gave orders to assemble the boats and crossing equipment and to distribute them among different units. He then set the date on which he wanted to cross. This, however, was upset by stormy weather which lasted for many days. Delaying until these winds subsided, al-Muwaffaq re- [2003] sumed the preparations for crossing and fighting against the deviate. When they were completed, on Wednesday, the twenty-fourth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 267 (Tuesday, July 28, 881), he crossed with a huge and fully-equipped army, and gave the order for many horses to be ferried over by boat. He commanded Abū al-'Abbās to march with the cavalry and to take with him all his officers from among the horsemen and infantry so as to attack the enemy in the rear on the lower part of the canal known as Nahr Munkā. He instructed his mawlā Masrūr al-Balkhī to go to the canal known as Nahr al-Gharbī, thereby forcing the abominable one to split his force. He ordered Nuṣayr Abū Ḥamzah and Rashīq, Abū al-'Abbās's page—he was one of his companions—who had almost as many ships as Nuṣayr, to sail to the mouth of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal and to fight whatever vessels of the abominable one they might come across. In the meanwhile, the latter increased the number of his vessels and manned them with the best of his fighting men. Abū Aḥmad advanced with his entire force to one of the fortresses of the abominable one's city—the latter had it reinforced by his own son, the one known as Ankalayh. He flanked Ankalayh with 'Alī b. Abān, Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Hamdānī, and provided the fortress with ballistas, catapults, and Nawukiyyah bows. He placed the archers in position and concentrated the major part of his army there. When the two parties came upon each other, al-Muwaffaq commanded the archers and lancers among the pages and blacks to draw nearer to the fortress in which the profligates were assembled. Between them was the canal known as Nahr al-[2004] Atrāk, which was wide and deep. When they arrived there, al-Muwaffaq's men began to waver, but after being encouraged by shouting, they moved ahead, swimming while the profligates were shooting at them from ballistas, catapults, and slings, and hurling stones by hand, shooting arrows from the Nawukiyyah bows, foot-bows and various other launching devices. Al-Muwaffaq's men bore up against all this, crossed the canal, and reached the walls; but the men who were outfitted for demolition operations failed to join them. Then the pages of Abū al-'Abbās were put in charge of breaking walls with the weapons at hand. God granted them success and facilitated their ascent. By specially adapted ladders, which were delivered to the spot, they mounted the fortress and planted one of al-Muwaffaq's flags there. After the heaviest of fighting, in which both parties bore great losses, the profligates surrendered their wall and left the battle-ground. In this operation, Thābit, a page of al-Muwaffaq who had been one of the most illustrious commanders among the pages, was struck by an arrow in the stomach and died. Al-Muwaffaq's troops succeeded in seizing the walls of the rebels; they burned down all the ballistas, catapults, and Nāwukiyyah bows, and then, evacuating that sector, they withdrew.

Abū al-'Abbās with his men and cavalry had moved toward the canal known as Nahr Munkā, when they came upon 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī and his troops. The enemy had come out to oppose them and push them back from their objective. Abū al-'Abbās charged 'Alī and routed him, killing a great many of his troops; but al-Muhallabī escaped. Abū al-'Abbās reached the spot from which he thought he might penetrate the city of the abominable one on the lower part of the Munkā Canal. He believed that the entrance into the city from this approach would [2005] be easy, but when he entered the trench he found it wide and impeding. However, he urged his men on and they crossed —the horsemen on their horses and the infantry by swimming—until they reached the wall, where he made a breach wide enough to enable them to get through. The first group to penetrate came upon Sulaymān b. Jāmi' who had come to defend this sector as soon as he learned that al-Muhallabī had fled. The government troops fought him. Ten pages of al-Muwaffaq who were in front of the men, repelled Sulaymān and his force, though there were many of them. They turned the enemy aside many times, defending their comrades until they withdrew to their positions.

Muḥammad b. Ḥammād reported: When al-Muwaffaq's troops seized the position that the profligate had entrusted to his son and his aforementioned men and officers, they scattered from the wall, as best they could, those who rushed them. Then the special demolition detachment arrived with tools and implements, and made a number of breaches in the wall. Al-Muwaffaq had prepared a special pontoon bridge to span the trench of the profligates. The bridge was set in place and all the people passed over it. Seeing this, the abominable ones became terrified and fled from a second wall to which they had been holding fast. Al-Muwaffaq's troops entered the city of the perfidious one. The deviate and his supporters fled, with al-Muwaffaq's troops in pursuit. They killed whoever came within their reach, and continued their chase until they came to the canal known as Nahr Ibn Sim'ān. The residence of Ibn Sim'ān fell to al-Muwaffaq's men, who burned everything in it and demolished it. The deviates held their position for a long time at Nahr Ibn Sim'ān, putting up stubborn resistance. [2006] One of al-Muwaffaq's pages pressed hard towards 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī and seized him by his cloak, but the latter disentangled himself, slipped out of the cloak which he flung at the page and narrowly escaped death. Al-Muwaffaq's troops charged the Zanj gallantly and forced them from Nahr Ibn Sim'ān, reaching the fringe of the profligate's review ground. When the abominable one heard that his troops had been routed and that al-Muwaffaq's force had penetrated into the outskirts of his city, he took to his mount together with his men; but here, on the fringe of the review ground, the troops of al-Muwaffaq came upon them and recognized them. They charged him, and dispersed his troops and others who were with him, separating him and leaving him isolated. One of the infantry got so close to the rebel that he struck the head of his horse with his shield. It was already sunset, and al-Muwaffaq ordered his men to return to their ships. They returned safely, carrying along a great many heads of slain rebels after having killed and wounded at random, and after having put (the enemy's) houses and markets to the torch. At the beginning of that day, a group of officers and horsemen of the deviate surrendered to Abū al-'Abbās, and he now had to transport them by boat. When night fell, a strong northern wind stirred, and the ebb tide became more pronounced causing most of the ships to be stuck in the mud. The abominable one urged his supporters on, encouraging them to act, and a group of them set out to attack some of the various vessels that remained behind. They seized them, killing some of the troops in them. Bahbūdh, who had been facing Masrūr al-Balkhī and his troops at Nahr al-Gharbī that day, attacked him, killing a number of his men, [2007] seizing captives as well as some of their animals. This broke the fighting spirit of al-Muwaffaq's men.

The same day, the abominable one brought all his barges out into the Tigris to fight against Rashīq, but Rashīq seized some of his ships; others, he sank and burned. The rest fled to the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal.

It is reported that on that day the profligate and his men were forced to disperse and flee at random to the al-Amīr, and to al-Qindal, Abrusān, 'Abbādān and the other villages. On that day two brothers of Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Sha'rānī, Muḥammad and 'Īsā, fled to the desert and remained there until word reached them that al-Muwaffaq's troops had withdrawn; only then did they return. A group of tribesmen who were at the profligate's camp also fled, and upon reaching al-Baṣrah, they sent a delegation to Abū Aḥmad seeking a guarantee of safe-conduct from him. Abū Aḥmad accepted this and sent out vessels to transport them to al-Muwaffaqiyyah. He ordered them clothed with robes of honor, gave them presents and provided them with allotments and a place to stay. Among those who surrendered was also one of the most illustrious commanders of the deviate, Rayḥān b. Sāliḥ al-Maghribī, a man of leadership and authority, who held the chamberlain's office for the son of the abominable one, that is, the son called Ankalayh.

Rayḥān applied in writing for his own safety and for the safety of a group of his men. This he was granted, and a large number of barges, galleys and ferries were sent out to him with Zīrak, the officer who commanded the vanguard of Abū al-'Abbās. Zīrak sailed along the canal known as Nahr al-Yahūdī, and reached the place known as al-Muṭṭawi'ah where he encountered Rayḥān and his men. This was the place where Zīrak had formerly arranged for them to meet. Zīrak escorted them to al-Muwaffaq's quarters, and robes of honor were ordered for Rayḥān. He was also presented with a number of horses and full equipment, and was assigned a generous yearly pension. His men also were clothed with robes of honor and allotted pensions according to their ranks; then they were assigned to Abū al-'Abbās and he ordered them transported to a position facing the palace of the abominable one. They were posted in a ship there and the abominable one's men thus learned about Rayḥān's desertion and that of his men, and about the kind reception they had been accorded. [2008]

Immediately, other troops of Rayḥān who had remained behind in the camp of the abominable one, as well as many others, surrendered. They were treated with the same generosity and kindness as their comrades. Rayḥān's desertion took place after the skirmish which occurred on Sunday, the twenty-eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 267(July 30, 881).

In this year Aḥmad b. 'Abdallāh al-Khujustānī, so he asserted, set out for Iraq. He reached Simnān[92] and learned that the people of al-Rayy had entrenched themselves against him and fortified their city. Then he withdrew from Simnān and returned to Khurāsān.

At the beginning of the year, a great many people turned back while en route to Mecca due to the oppressive heat. A large number who continued their journey died because of the heat and thirst. Also in this year, the Fazārah fell upon the merchants and, reportedly, seized seven hundred loads of cloth.

In this year, at the pilgrims' station in Mecca, an agent ('āmil) of Aḥmad b. Ṭulūn with his horsemen, and an agent of 'Amr b. al-Layth with his horsemen, arrived simultaneously. [2009]

92. A town in the Qūmis region. See Le Strange, Lands, 360.

Each of them claimed his master's right to plant his flag to the right side of the pulpit in the Mosque of Ibrāhīm Khalīl al-Raḥmān,[93] since each claimed that the rights of guardianship belonged to his patron. They brandished their swords and most of the people fled the mosque. The Zanj clients of Hārūn b. Muḥammad backed the agent of 'Amr b. al-Layth, and he was able to do as he wished. Hārūn, who was governor of Mecca, cut his sermon short and the people were saved from harm. The one called Abū al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī was then in charge of maintaining security in the congregation.

Also in this year al-Ṭibā' was expelled from Sāmarrā.

Also in this year, al-Khujustānī minted dīnārs and dirhams, each dīnār being ten dāniqs in weight and each dirham, eight. The legend ran, "Rule and Power are with God. He is the Lord of strength and might. There is no God but God, and Muḥammad is the messenger of God." Next to it was written, "The one who relies upon God dwells in happiness and prosperity;" the other side read, "The Faithful, Aḥmad b. 'Abdallāh."

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Mūsā b. 'Īsā al-Hāshimī.

---

93. That is Abraham, the patriarch.

The Events of the Year 268

(August 1, 881–July 20, 882)

On Tuesday,the first day of al-Muḥarram (August 12, 881), Ja'far b. al-Ibrāhīm, who was known as al-Sajjān, sought safe-conduct from Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq. It is mentioned that [2010] the reason for this was Abū Aḥmad's battle at the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 267 (July 3-31, 881), to which we have referred above, as well as the flight of Rayḥān b. Ṣāliḥ al-Maghribī and his men from the camp of the deviate, and their linking up with Abū Aḥmad. The abominable one became completely discouraged at this; al-Sajjān was, reportedly, one of his trustworthy associates.

Abū Aḥmad conferred on this al-Sajjān robes of honor, various gifts, as well as a military allotment, and a place of lodging. Al-Sajjān was assigned to Abū al-'Abbās, who was ordered to transport him in a barge to a position in front of the abominable one's fortress so his (former) compatriots could see him. Al-Sajjān addressed them and told them that they were misled by the abominable one; he informed them what he had experienced because of the latter's lies and immoral behavior. The same day that al-Sajjān was placed in front of the abominable one's camp, a great many Zanj officers and others sought guarantees of safety; all of them were treated kindly. One after another the enemy sought safety and abandoned the abominable one.

After that battle which I have mentioned as having taken place on the last day of Dhū al-Ḥijjah of the year (2)67 (July 31, 881), Abū Aḥmad did not cross over to fight the abominable one, thus giving his troops a respite until the month of Rabī' II (November 9–December 7, 881).

In this year, 'Amr b. al-Layth went to Fārs to fight Muḥammad b. al-Layth, his own governor in this province. 'Amr routed Muḥammad b. al-Layth and auctioned off the spoils of his camp; the latter escaped with a small group of his men. 'Amr entered Iṣṭakhr, which was looted by his troops, and then sent a force to chase after Muḥammad b. al-Layth. They seized him, and then delivered him to 'Amr, a prisoner. Thereupon, 'Amr went to Shīrāz where he remained.

On the eighth of Rabī' I, 268 (Monday, October 10, 881) an [2011] earthquake shook Baghdad. This was followed by a heavy rain which lasted for three days. Four thunderstorms hit the city.

In this year, al-'Abbās b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn marched to fight his father, who went out to meet him at Alexandria. Aḥmad seized him and they returned together to Miṣr.

On the fifteenth of Rabī' II (Nov. 23, 881), Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq crossed over to the city of the rebel. This took place after Abū Aḥmad had weakened the rebel by carrying out severe actions against him. He blockaded his city, and cut off his food supplies, so that a great many of the rebel's troops sought guarantees of safe-conduct. He was able to accomplish this because he was positioned at his city, al-Muwaffaqiyyah.

When he decided to cross over to the enemy's city, Abū Aḥmad, reportedly, instructed his son Abū al-'Abbās to go to that section of the city's fortification, where the abominable one had entrusted the defenses to his son and his most stalwart troops and officers. Abū Aḥmad himself made for the section of the wall between the canals known as Nahr Munkā and Nahr Ibn Sim'ān. He ordered Sa'īd, his wazīr, to go to the mouth of the canal known as Nahr Juwway Kūr with Zīrak at his flank, then he ordered Masrūr al-Balkhī to go to the Nahr al-Gharbī.

He assigned each of them a team of sappers to demolish the walls facing them, but at the same time, he instructed them not to carry out excessive demolition work, and not to enter the abominable one's city. To every area where he sent his commanders, Abū Aḥmad also assigned barges with archers. He instructed them to use their arrows to protect the sappers and the infantry from the Zanj. Many breaches were made in the walls and Abū Aḥmad's troops poured through all of them into the rebel's city. The men of the abominable one came to do [2012] combat, but Abū Aḥmad's troops routed them. The government force followed on their heels, pursuing them into the city, where the diverging roads, streets and ravines forced them to split up and separate. Setting fires and killing, Abū Aḥmad's men penetrated further than previously.

But the abominable one's men counterattacked and pressed Abū Aḥmad's troops. Their ambushers emerged from prepared positions which the others had not known, and thus Abū Aḥmad's men who were inside the city were caught unaware. Defending themselves, they retreated toward the Tigris; most of them reached the river. Some of them boarded vessels, others threw themselves into the water and were picked up by the men of the barges, and some of them were killed. The abominable one's troops captured arms and (other) booty.

A detachment of Abū Aḥmad's pages made a stand near the residence of Ibn Sim'ān. Among them were Rashīd, Mūsā, the son of Mufliḥ's sister, and a group of officers. They were the last of the troops to stand fast. The Zanj surrounded them, and with a superior force, they stood between them and the barges. However, the government troops defended themselves and their men and fought their way back to the barges, upon which they embarked. Some thirty pages from Daylam stood facing the Zanj and their allies, covering the retreating forces and assuring their safety. These thirty Daylamites were killed to the last man, after taking as many of the rebels as they could. The government troops were very grieved by the losses they had suffered in this battle, as Abū Aḥmad returned with his men to his city al-Muwaffaqiyyah. He assembled all his men and censured them for disobeying his instruction without consulting him about his plan and how to execute it. He threatened them [2013] with the most severe punishment if they disregarded his orders again. Then he ordered a count of the missing of his troops, and when this was done and their names presented to him, Abū Aḥmad made arrangement so that what was due the missing would be transferred to their children and families. When the men saw his care for the heirs of those who had perished in his service, they were favorably impressed. They respected him all the more, and their good faith increased.

In this year Abū al-'Abbās fought and exterminated a band of tribesmen who were smuggling provisions to the profligate.

The Battle against the Tribesmen

It is said that when the abominable one had devastated al-Baṣrah, he appointed Aḥmad b. Mūsā b. Sa'īd, the one called al-Qalūṣ, one of his earliest companions, as governor of the city. While al-Qalūṣ conducted the affairs of al-Baṣrah, it became the profligate's port. The tribesmen and merchants travelled to the city and carried off provisions and merchandise, which they then transferred to the camp of the abominable one. This lasted until Abū Aḥmad conquered Ṭahīthā and al-Qalūṣ was captured. Then, the abominable one appointed Mālik b. Bishrān, the son of al-Qalūṣ's sister, to govern al-Baṣrah and its surroundings. When now, Abū Aḥmad descended upon Furāt al- Baṣrah, the rebel feared that Abū Aḥmad would attack this Mālik—he was at the time stationed at Sayḥān[94] on the canal known as Nahr Ibn 'Utbah. He thus wrote to Mālik instructing him to transfer his camp to the canal known as Nahr al-Dīnārī, and to dispatch a detachment of his men to catch fish and to deliver the catch to his, that is, the abominable one's camp. He ordered him to send another group to the road which the tribesmen took from the desert, and to learn whether any of them [2014] were carrying provisions. In case a party of tribesmen with provisions was encountered, the instructions were to go to them and to deliver their provisions to the abominable one.

94. Not to be confused with the town of that name located in Bilād al-Rūm. See Le Strange, Lands, 131. I have not found any reference to a Sayḥān in the vicinity of the battles.

Complying with these instructions, Mālik, the nephew of al-Qalūṣ, sent two inhabitants to the Great Swamp from the village Basmā.[95] One of them was al-Rayyān, the other al-Khalīl; both were staying in the camp of the abominable one. Al-Khalīl and al-Rayyān set out and gathered a band of people from the Ṭaff[96] and went to Basmā. They remained there, transporting catches of fish, one catch at a time. The fish were shipped from the Great Swamp,[97] to the abominable one's camp. They used small skiffs which could pass through the narrow canals and small waterways (al-arkhanjān),[98] which no barge or galley could traverse. As long as the two men stayed in the aforementioned place, a constant supply of fish moved from the Great Swamp to the abominable one's camp. Also reaching him were the provisions and other supplies brought by the tribesmen by way of the desert. This was sufficient for his army. In this way the situation of the people of his camp was eased. This continued on until 'Alī b. 'Umar, who was known as al-Nazzāb— he was one of the rebel's men who had been posted with al-Qalūṣ—sought safe-conduct with al-Muwaffaq and reported to him about Mālik b. Bishrān. He told him of Mālik's position on the Dīnārī Canal, how the latter supplied the abominable one's camp with fish from the Great Swamp, and of the deliveries by the tribesmen.

Al-Muwaffaq directed his mawlā Zīrak to take barges and galleys to the location where al-Qalūṣ's nephew was situated, whereupon Zīrak pounced upon him and his men. Zīrak killed some of them and captured others. The rest scattered, leaving Mālik, who fled and returned to the abominable one. The latter sent him back with a force to the lower part of the canal [2015] known as Nahr al-Yahūdī. Mālik then camped there, at a spot close to the canal known as Nahr al-Fayyāḍ, and as a result provisions from the area adjacent to the marshes of the Fayyāḍ again were arriving at the abominable one's camp.

When word reached al-Muwaffaq that Mālik was stationed

95. See above, n. 1.

96. For the Ṭaff region of the Euphrates, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 539.

97. The Great Swamp was famous for its fish which were easily caught. See Le Strange, Lands, 43.

98. For al-arkhanjān, see Ṭabarī, Introductio et al, CXI.

at the lower part of the Yahūdī Canal and that provisions from that sector were reaching the rebel's camp, he instructed his son Abū al-'Abbās to go to the Nahr al-Amīr and the canal called Nahr al-Fayyāḍ to verify the report which had reached him. The troops marched out and came upon a band of tribesmen under the command of an officer who was conveying camels, sheep, and other food-stuff from the desert. Abū al-'Abbās attacked, killing some of them and taking the rest prisoner. Only their leader escaped, for he was riding a fast mare. All the camels, sheep, and food which these tribesmen were conveying were seized. Abū al-'Abbās cut off a hand of one of the captives and let him go, whereupon the man arrived at the abominable one's camp and brought to him the news of what had befallen him. Abū al-'Abbās's attack on these tribesmen so terrified Mālik, the nephew of al-Qalūṣ, that he sought a guarantee of safe-conduct from Abū Aḥmad. He was granted protection, and gifts were bestowed upon him. Mālik was also given robes of honor and assigned to Abū al-'Abbās. In addition he received a military allotment and lodging.

In place of Mālik, the abominable one appointed one of al-Qalūṣ's companions, Aḥmad b. al-Junayd, and he instructed him to camp at the place known as Dahrshīr, and at the lower part of Nahr Abū al-Khaṣīb. Aḥmad was to proceed with his [2016] men to a place from where he could procure the fish from the Great Swamp and then transport it to the camp of the abominable one.

A report about Aḥmad b. al-Junayd reached Abū Aḥmad who sent one of his mawlā commanders, called al-Tarmudān, with a body of troops. This force encamped on the island known as al-Rūḥiyyah, whereupon the supply of fish from the Great Swamp to the camp of the abominable one was cut off. Al-Muwaffaq also directed Shibāb b. al-'Alā' and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, both 'Anbarīs, to take cavalry and prevent the tribesmen from transporting food to the camp of the abominable one. He gave further instructions that the market of al-Baṣrah be opened to the tribesmen so that they could transport the dates they wanted to sell to that market, since the desire for profit was what had induced them to journey to the abominable one's camp.

Now, Shihāb and Muḥammad proceeded as instructed, and stationed themselves at Qaṣr 'Īsā.[99] The tribesmen brought them the dates they had taken from the desert and began selling them on behalf of the two officers. Abū Aḥmad then dismissed al-Tarmudān from al-Baṣrah, replacing him with one of his Farghānī officers, a man called Qayṣar b. Urkhūz Ikhshādh Farghānah. He also sent out Nuṣayr,the one called Abū Ḥamzah, with barges and galleys, ordering him to position himself at Fayḍ al-Baṣrah[100] and Nahr Dubays. In addition, he was to penetrate to the Ubullah, Ma'qil and Gharbī canals. He carried out these orders.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan———Muḥammad b. Ḥammād: When Nuṣayr and Qayṣar were positioned at al-Baṣrah, they used barges to cut the flow of provisions to the abominable one and his supporters. That is, they cut off those provisions which had been brought from the Great Swamp and the sea. The rebels therefore devised a scheme by which they travelled the Nahr al-Amīr to al-Qindal, then the Masīḥī Canal to [2017] the roads leading to the hinterland and the sea. In this way, their provisions came by sea and land, as did their supplies of sea fish.

When word of this reached al-Muwaffaq, he instructed Rashīq, Abū al-'Abbās's page, to establish a camp at Jawwīth Bārūbah, east of the Tigris, in front of Nahr al-Amīr. He also ordered him to dig and fortify a trench. In addition, he instructed Abū al-'Abbās to assign to Rashīq five thousand of his best men and thirty barges. Al-Muwaffaq then ordered Rashīq to position these barges at the mouth of the Amīr Canal and to establish a patrol of fifteen barges with which to penetrate the waterway up to the intersection by which the Zanj were passing to Dubbā, al-Qindal and the canal known as Nahr al-Masīḥī. The patrols were to remain there, and if any of the abominable ones (men) were to appear, the government troops were to attack them. After the patrol was completed, they withdrew immediately, to be replaced by the other patrol waiting at the mouth of the canal. They acted according to these instructions. Rashīq camped at the place to which he was ordered and the routes the rebels used to pass to Dubbā, al-Qindal and the Masīḥī Canal were seized. Thus, the enemy no longer had access to the hinterland or the sea; the rebels' sphere of operation narrowed and the blockade became more severe.

99. Not to be confused with the famous Qaṣr 'Īsā in Baghdad. See Lassner, Topography, index, 321. I have not succeeded in identifying a Qaṣr 'Īsā in the region of the battles.

100. The fayḍ (Estuary of) al-Baṣrah is identical with the Blind Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 43.

In this year, the brother of Sharkab attacked al-Khujustānī and seized his mother, and Ibn Shabath b. al-Ḥasan rebelled and captured 'Umar b. Sīmā, governor of Ḥulwān.

[2018] In this year, Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh left 'Amr b. al-Layth. The latter had sent him to Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf carrying funds. 'Amr sent on what was demanded of him: more than three hundred thousand dīnārs and gifts, among them fifty manns[101] of musk, fifty manns of saffron, two hundred manns of aloes, three hundred embroidered and other garments, gold and silver vessels, and two hundred thousand dīnārs worth of animals and slaves. The total value of what he sent in gifts amounted to five hundred thousand dīnārs.

In this year, Kayghalagh appointed al-Khalīl Rīmāl governor of Ḥulwān. The new governor treated the rebels harshly on account of 'Umar b. Sīmā and the crime commited by Ibn Shabath. They guaranteed Ibn Sīmā's release and set right the business concerning Ibn Shabath.

In this year, Rashīq, the page of Abū al-'Abbās b. al-Muwaffaq, attacked a band of the Banū Tamīm who had cooperated with the Zanj when the latter had occupied and burned al-Baṣrah. The reason for this was as follows. Word reached Abū al-'Abbās that some of these tribesmen were bringing provisions, such as wheat, camels and sheep from the hinterland to the abominable one's city. It was also indicated that they were in the lower part of the Amīr Canal, expecting ships which were to come to them from the lower part of the rebel's camp in order to transport them and their goods. Rashīq set out with his barges and came upon them at the place where they had stopped, that is, the canal known as Nahr al-Isḥāqī.[102] He attacked them, taking them unawares. He killed most of them, and took a group prisoner—there were merchants who had left the camp of the abominable one in order to bring the provi- [2019] sions. Rashīq seized all kinds of provisions from them, as well as the water buffalos, camels and asses which they used to transport them. He then sent the prisoners and heads (of the slain) in his barges and vessels to al-Muwaffaqiyyah. On al-Muwaffaq's order, the heads were fastened on the barges and the prisoners hung for display so that everyone could see the success of Rashīq and his men. As a result they were paraded throughout the camp. Following this the order was given, and the heads and captives were taken past the camp of the abominable one so that those in the camp might know about Rashīq and his attack on those who bring provisions to them. Among those seized by Rashīq was one of the tribesmen who used to travel between the leader of the Zanj and the tribesmen, negotiating the supply of provisions. Al-Muwaffaq had one of the man's hands and feet cut off; then he was thrown into the abominable one's camp. The command was given to behead the captives and it was carried out. All that Rashīq's troops had obtained was placed at their disposal. The order was given for Rashīq to receive robes of honor and presents, and return to his camp. The number of troops seeking safe-conduct from Rashīq increased, and on the instructions of Abū Aḥmad, all of them were assigned to the former's command. Their numbers grew to the point that his base had become as crowded as any of the largest camps. Supplies to the abominable one and his men were cut off from all directions, as all roads to them were blocked. The blockade hit them hard, and weakened them physically. The captives and deserters among them were asked when they had last seen bread. Surprised, they would say they had not seen bread for a year or two. [2020]

101. One mann = 2 raṭl, according to the established legal weight. In reality, the mann varied in different places and in different periods. See Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 16 ff.; also, see below, nn. 109, 127.

102. This does not seem to be the Isḥāqī Canal which flowed near Sāmarrā. See Le Strange, Lands, 52. I have not succeeded in identifying a canal of this name in the region of the battles.

With the troops of the perfidious one reaching this condition, al-Muwaffaq decided to resume attacking them in order to aggravate their injured state and fatigue. At this time, great throngs came to Abū Aḥmad, seeking guarantees of safe-conduct. Those who remained in the lines of the profligate had to resort to devious schemes by which to obtain their daily nourishment. They would scatter about villages and canals that were distant from their camp to look for food. When news of this reached Abū Aḥmad, he instructed a group of commanders and officers from the ranks ('arīf) drawn from among his black pages to go to the places frequented by the Zanj. They were to try and win their confidence, and ask for their loyalty. Any one among the Zanj who refused was to be killed, and his head delivered to Abū Aḥmad. He offered them a reward so that they became zealous in executing their duty by day and night. Not a day passed without a group coming over to them, or without the heads of slain being delivered, or prisoners taken.

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan———Muḥammad b. Ḥammād: When the number of the Zanj prisoners in al-Muwaffaq's camp became great, he ordered a review of them. Whosoever was strong, stalwart, and able to carry arms, he favored with kindness. He integrated them with black pages causing them to take cognizance of his generosity. Those who were feeble and infirm, or worn out, or aged and unable to bear arms, or disabled by wounds, were each given two garments, some dirhams and food. They were then transported back to the camp of the abominable one, where they were left after being instructed to describe al-Muwaffaq's kind treatment to all who came to him. They were also instructed to say that he intended to offer the same treatment to anyone seeking safety [2021] with him or falling into his hands.

By these measures al-Muwaffaq succeeded in attaining his goal of causing the troops of the Zanj leader to become preoccupied with coming over to him, and making peace and offering their allegiance. Time and again, al-Muwaffaq and his son Abū al-'Abbās began to lead their troops in person while engaging the abominable one and his men in combat. They killed, captured, and inflicted many casualties. In one of these skirmishes, Abū al-'Abbās was hit and wounded by an arrow.[103] However, he recovered from this wound.

In Rajab of this year (January 25–February 23, 882), Bahbūdh, the companion of the abominable one, was killed.

How Bahbūdh Was Slain

It is reported that among the companions of the profligate, Bahbūdh b. 'Abd al-Wahhāb was the one who held the record for the most raids, and was the most successful in cutting the highways and expropriating money. He had amassed a great fortune in this way. Frequently he would go out with his swift galleys, passing through the canals leading to the Tigris. If he would come upon a vessel belonging to the troops of al-Muwaffaq, he would seize it and bring it into the canal from which he had emerged. If someone pursued him for a long way, a specially prepared detachment of his men would emerge from the canal, cutting off the enemy and attacking him. Since this occurred quite often, and people were becoming more careful, he began riding in a barge which he made to resemble the barges of al-Muwaffaq, planting on it flags similar to those of the latter. He would go with this vessel to the Tigris, and if he took the government troops by surprise, he would attack, killing and taking prisoners. He would also penetrate the Ubullah, Ma'qil, Bathq Shīrīn, and Dayr canals, whereupon, he would cut the roads and waylay travellers, taking their money and lives.

When information about all these actions of Bahbūdh [2022] reached al-Muwaffaq, he decided to block all the canals which lent themselves to this movement and place barges at the mouths of the large canals to secure them from the actions of Bahbūdh and his accomplices. In addition, he would make the roads and highways safe for the people.

Thus, when the routes were placed under guard, and those canals which could be blocked had been blocked, and when Bahbūdh's freedom to maneuver was thus curtailed, he stayed waiting for an opportunity to exploit the carelessness of the barge crews which were entrusted with (securing) the mouth of the Nahr al-Ubullah. He waited until such a chance presented itself, and then he slipped through from the lower part of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal with his barges and galleys resembling those of al-Muwaffaq's forces, as they hoisted similar flags. He manned his flotilla with his strongest, boldest and most courageous troops, and he led it from the lower part of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal into an intersecting waterway, leading to the Yahūdī and from there to the Nāfidh. When he finally reached the Ubullah, he came upon barges and galleys that had been arrayed to safeguard the canal. The crews of the barges were completely unaware and unprepared. Bahbūdh attacked, killing some and capturing others, while six barges were seized. Following this, he retreated along the Ubullah Canal.

103. See Popovic, Révolte, 142 ff.

When news about Bahbūdh reached al-Muwaffaq, he instructed Abū al-'Abbās to set out against him with barges from the canal known as Nahr al-Yahūdī. He hoped that his son would beat Bahbūdh to the intersecting canal, cutting the rebel's escape route. Abū al-'Abbās reached the place called al-Muṭṭawwi'ah but Bahbūdh had beaten him to it and entered the canal called Nahr al-Sa'īdī, which led to Nahr Abū al-Khaṣīb.

Abū al-'Abbās caught sight of Bahbūdh's barges and, eagerly desiring to reach them, he increased his speed, coming abreast with the enemy. They engaged in a fight in which Abū al-'Ab-[2023] bās killed a number of Bahbūdh's men while taking others prisoner. One contingent asked Abū al-'Abbās for safety but a great many of Bahbūdh's force stood by the Zanjid, steadfastly protecting him. Since all this took place when the water level tended to be low, the government barges ran into the mud in those sections of the canals and junctions where the water was receding. Bahbūdh and the rest of his men thus escaped by the skin of their teeth.

Al-Muwaffaq continued to besiege the abominable one and his men, blocking his supply lines; the number of those seeking safe-conduct from the government increased. Al-Muwaffaq saw to it that all of them were accorded robes of honor and presents, and paraded on excellent horses with saddles, bridles, and other equipment. In addition military allotments were issued to them.

Reports reached al-Muwaffaq afterwards that want and misery had impelled a party of the abominable one's men to scatter about the villages in search of food, such as fish and dates. So, he ordered his son Abū al-'Abbās to hurry to these villages and places with his barges, galleys, and his swift skiffs. He was to take his strongest, most courageous and steadfast men and intercept those people, thus preventing their return to the city of the leader of the Zanj. Abū al-'Abbās set forth to carry out these orders.

The abominable one learned about this expedition of Abū al-'Abbās against him, and he instructed Bahbūdh to set out with his men in secret along the intersections and deserted canals as far as al-Qindal, Abrusān and the surrounding areas. As instructed by the abominable one, Bahbūdh went out to his destination with a Zanj detachment, but blocking his way was one of Abū al-'Abbās's galleys filled with archers drawn from his pages. Bahbūdh was eager to get the galley and went after it. Its defenders gave battle, and one of the black pages of the galley thrust at Bahbūdh with his lance and hit him in the stomach. Bahbūdh fell into the water, but his men ran and picked him up. They fled carrying him to the camp of the abominable one. God had taken his life, however, before they reached the camp. [2024]

The profligate and his leading men were overwhelmed by this loss, and their grief increased because of it. Bahbūdh's death was one of Abū Aḥmad's greatest victories, but he was unaware of his end until one of the sailors surrendering to him told him the news. Abū Aḥmad rejoiced with this report and ordered the page who had killed Bahbūdh brought to him. He was presented to Abū Aḥmad, who gave him presents, raiment and a neck ring, as well as an increase in his allotment. All the others in that galley were presented with special gifts, robes of honor, and other presents.

In this year, the month of Ramaḍān (March 25–April 23, 882) began on a Sunday. The second Sunday of Ramaḍān was Palm Sunday, the third Sunday was Easter, the fourth was Nayrūz,[104] and the fifth was the last day of the month.

In this year, Abū Aḥmad captured al-Dhawā'ibī—he had been collaborating with the leader of the Zanj.

In this year, a battle took place between Yadkūtakīn b. Asātakīn and Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz.[105] Yadkūtakīn routed the latter and took Qumm from him.

In this year, 'Amr b. al-Layth, on the order of Abū Aḥmad, sent an officer to capture Muḥammad b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Azārmard al-Kurdi.[106] The officer captured him and delivered him to 'Amr.

[2025] In Dhū al-Qa'dah of this year (May 23–June 21, 882), one of the descendants of 'Abd al-Mālik b. Ṣāliḥ al-Hāshimī—he was called Bakkār—revolted in Syria (in the region) between Salamyah, Aleppo and Homs. He called upon the people to pledge allegiance to Abū Aḥmad, but Ibn 'Abbās al Kilābī fought against him and was routed. Then, Lu'lu', Ibn Ṭūlūn's companion, sent a general called Būdan against him with a vast army, but on his return he scarcely had one soldier left.

In this year, Lu'lu' declared his revolt against Ibn Ṭūlūn.

In this year, the leader of the Zanj killed Ibn Mālik the Zanjid because word reached him that the latter intended to join Abū Aḥmad.

In this year, Aḥmad b. 'Abdallāh al-Khujustānī was killed. He was killed by a page of his in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 22–July 20, 882).

In this year, the troops of Ibn Abī al-Sāj killed Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. Ḥabīb al-Yashkarī,[107] in a village near Wāsiṭ. His head was displayed in Baghdad.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Kumushjūr fought against 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn Kuftimur and captured him, but he subsequently set him free. This was in Dhū al-Ḥijjah (June 22–July 20, 882).

In this year, the 'Alid, known as al-Ḥarūn, was imprisoned. The reason for this was that he had intercepted and seized a 104. That is, the Persian New Year also known as Nawrūz.

105. That is, the son of Abū Dulaf.
106. See Ṭabarī, III/3, 1908 ff.
107. Ibid., 1920 ff.

dispatch case containing a report on the state of the pilgrimage. The deputy of Ibn Abī al-Sāj sent his men out to the Mecca Road and they seized al-Ḥarūn and delivered him to al-Muwaffaq. [2026]

In this year, Abū al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī marched on Mecca, where Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī was governor. Hārūn rallied an army of about two thousand men, and with their help he thwarted al-Makhzūmī. The latter now turned toward 'Ayn Mushāsh[108] and spoiled its well. From there, he went to Jidda, looted its food, and burned down its houses. The price of bread in Mecca rose to a dirham for two ūqiyah.[109]

In this year Ibn Ṣaqlabiyyah, the emperor of the Byzantines, took the field and besieged Malaṭyah, but the people of Mar'ash and al-Ḥadath[110] assisted the people of Malaṭyah, and routed the emperor, chasing him up to al-Sarī'.

Khalaf al-Farghānī, the governor of Ibn Ṭūlūn, conducted the annual summer expedition along the Syrian frontier. He killed some ten thousand Greeks and took booty. The share for each participant in the raid reached forty dīnārs.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī; Ibn Abī al-Sāj was in charge of security and safety on the road.

---

108. This well provided Mecca with a major part of its drinking water. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 536.

109. One ūqiyah = 1/12 of a raṭl. At this time in history, it would have been about 125 gr. See Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 34–35; also, see above, n. 101, and below, n. 127.

110. Mar'ash was situated on the Syrian border; al-Ḥadath was a fortress nearby. See Le Strange, Lands, 122.

The Events of the Year

269

(July 21, 882–August 9, 883)

Among the events, the 'Alid known as al-Ḥarūn was brought into the camp of Abū Aḥmad in al-Muḥarram (July 21–August 19, 882). He was carried on a camel, wearing a brocade cloak (qabā'), and a tall hat (qalansuwah). He was then transported in a barge to a position where the leader of the Zanj could see him and hear the speech of the messengers.

[2027] In al-Muḥarram of this year, the tribesmen waylaid and plundered a caravan of pilgrims between Tūz and Sumayrā'.[111] They seized some five thousand camels with their loads and abducted many people.

On the fourteenth night of al-Muḥarram (Wednesday, August 1, 882), a total eclipse of the moon took place. On the twenty-eighth of the same month (August 17, 882)—which was a Friday—at sunset, there was a total eclipse of the sun. Thus, in the month of al-Muḥarram, the eclipse of both sun and moon took place.

---

111. Two places situated along the pilgrimmage route. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 893.

In Ṣafar of this year (August 20–September 17, 882), the mob attacked Ibrāhīm al-Khalījī and plundered his house in Baghdad. The reason for this was that one of his servants had shot a woman with an arrow and killed her. Al-Khalījī implored the authorities for protection but when they recommended that he deliver the servant, he refused. His servants shot at the people, killing some and wounding others, among them two police officers. Ibrāhīm then fled, but his servants were seized and his house and stables were plundered. Muḥammad, the son of 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir, who was stationed at the Main Bridge for his father,[112] gathered the animals and anything else he could of Ibrāhīm's plundered property. He did this because 'Ubaydallāh had instructed him to deliver all these things to Ibrāhīm. He confirmed the fact that all these things were returned.

In this year, having reached al-Ṭā'if in the course of his withdrawal from Mecca, Ibn Abī al-Sāj dispatched a force to Jidda which seized two boats of al-Makhzūmī loaded with both money and weapons.

In this year, Rūmī b. Khashanaj seized three Farghānī officers, one of them was named Ṣadīq, the other Ṭakhshā, and the third Tughān, and put them in chains. Ṣadīq was wounded but he escaped. [2028]

In Rabī' I of this year (September 18–October 17, 882), Khalaf, the companion of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn and his governor for the Syrian frontier, attacked Yāzamān al- Khādim, the mawlā of al-Fatḥ b. Khāqān, and imprisoned him. A group of inhabitants from the frontier fell upon Khalaf and rescued Yāzamān, whereupon, the former fled and the people withdrew their allegiance from Ibn Ṭūlūn and cursed him from the pulpits. When this reached Ibn Ṭūlūn he left Egypt for Damascus, and from there he went to the Syrian frontier, stopping in Adhanah. In the meanwhile, Yāzamān and the inhabitants of Ṭarsūs dammed all the flood-gates of the city except for the Bāb al-Jihād and the Bāb al-Baḥr.[113] The water then overflowed near 112. That is, at the headquarters of the ṣaḥib al-shurṭah, the prefect of police, who was in charge of security. See Lassner, Topography, 151.

113. These were two fortresses. See Le Strange, Lands, 131.

Adhanah and the surrounding area. They entrenched themselves in Ṭarsūs, while Ibn Ṭūlūn positioned himself in Adhanah for some time. Then he returned to Antioch, and from there he went to Homs and then on to Damascus where he remained.

In this year, Lu'lu', the page of Ibn Ṭūlūn, opposed his patron. At the outbreak of the dispute, Lu'lu' held Homs, Aleppo, Qinnasrīn and Diyar Muḍar. He went to Bālis[114] and looted the city, capturing Sa'īd and his brother, the sons of al-'Abbās al-Kilābī. Then, Lu'lu' corresponded with Abū Aḥmad about going over to the latter's side and breaking with Ibn Ṭūlūn. He stipulated certain conditions which Abū Aḥmad accepted.
[2029] Lu'lu', who was in al-Raqqah, left the city, taking with him a group of inhabitants from al-Rāfiqah[115] among others. They went to Qarqīsiyyā, where Ibn Ṣafwān al-'Uqaylī was stationed. Lu'lu' attacked Ibn Ṣafwān and seized the city which he turned over to Aḥmad b. Mālik b. Ṭawq. Ibn Ṣafwān fled and Lu'lu' set course for Baghdad.

In this year, an arrow shot by a Greek page of the abominable one—the page was called Qarṭās—hit Abū Aḥmad soon after he entered the abominable one's city in order to demolish its walls. The reason for this, according to reports, (is as follows). After the abominable Bahbūdh perished, the leader of the Zanj coveted the treasures and wealth which Bahbūdh had amassed. He had verified that his possessions amounted to two hundred thousand dīnārs, and jewels, gold and silver of great value. He used every strategem in searching for this, coveting it so much that he imprisoned all of Bahbūdh's leading men, relatives and companions. He flogged them, and ransacked house after house and destroyed building after building belonging to Bahbūdh, hoping to find anything buried there, but he found nothing.

That which he had done to Bahbūdh's leading men while 114. A town west of al-Raqqah, which was an important way station on the caravan route. See Le Strange, Lands, 107.

115. Raqqah-Rāfiqah was a composite city. The former was the private sector occupied by the civilian populace; the latter was the government sector that housed the local authority and garrison behind imposing walls. That is, al-Rāfiqah was an administrative center, al-Raqqah an integrated city.

searching for the wealth was one of the factors that turned the rebel's companions against him. It invited their anger, and caused them to shun the leader of the Zanj. Al-Muwaffaq gave orders to announce that he was offering safe-conduct to protect Bahbūdh's companions. When this was announced, they rushed to him gladly. They were then given favors, various gifts, robes of honor, and a military allotment according to their rank.

Abū Aḥmad observed that crossing to the camp of the rebel was difficult at those times when the winds stirred the waters [2030] of the Tigris. He therefore decided to prepare a place to serve as an encampment for himself and his troops on the western side of the Tigris between Dayr Jābil and Nahr al-Mughīrah. He gave the order to cut down the palm trees and (prepare) the ground for a defensive perimeter. It was to be surrounded by defensive trenches and fortified with walls to make it safe from night raids and unexpected assaults by the rebels. He set up shifts supervised by his officers. Everyone took his turn in going with the infantry and the laborers who were with them to work from early morning all through the day, preparing the camp which Abū Aḥmad had decided to establish there.

To counter this, the profligate also set up shifts with 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī, Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Hamadānī, each of them taking a shift for the day. The abominable one's son, the one known as Ankalāy, used to accompany Sulaymān every day of his shift, and he often did the same with Ibrāhīm. Later, the abominable one appointed Ankalāy instead of Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far, and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' accomanpanied the former. The abominable one then assigned Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Sha'rānī and his brothers to Ankalāy and they were constantly with him.

The abominable one knew that, given the terror of his men as the two armies came close, should al-Muwaffaq draw near to him during the fighting, the former would close the gap between himself and those seeking to flee to the government forces. With this, the rebel's position would collapse and all his [2031] preparations would be compromised. Therefore, he instructed his men to do combat with the government officers crossing every day, and to thwart their attempts to prepare the camp to which the enemy wanted to transfer. On one of those days stormy winds broke out at a time when one of al-Muwaffaq's officers had crossed to the western side of the Tigris. The rebel, saw the captain isolated, cut off from his troops, and prevented from re-crossing by the stormy Tigris, he seized this opportunity to move against him with all his army, a group much larger than the government officer's contingent. The barges which had been assigned to the officer could not reach their assigned places because the wind tossed them against the rocks, and the crews feared their vessels would be torn apart. The Zanj overpowered this officer and his men, dislodging them from their positions. They overtook one detachment, and the government force stood fast and was killed to the very last man. The Zanj chased after another group which had fled to the water. They took prisoners and killed some men, but most of the enemy escaped. Reaching their ships they jumped in and crossed to al-Muwaffaqiyyah.

This success of the profligates caused much grief and became a matter of grave concern to the people of al-Muwaffaq's camp. Abū Aḥmad now thought that the plan of encamping on the western bank of the Tigris was unpromising and unsafe from the stratagems of the profligate and his men, who would always be able to raid by night or find some easy way to escape and gain a respite due to the many thickets of the terrain and the difficulty of passing through there. He realized that the Zanj were more able than his troops to pass those desolate [2032] places and found it easier to do so. So he abandoned his plan of setting up camp on the western bank of the Tigris. He now set his goal at razing the walls of the profligate's city, and extending the roads and passes leading there for his troops. With that, he gave instructions to start with the demolition of the wall in the section adjacent to the canal known as Nahr Munkā.

To meet this threat the abominable one sent his son, the one known as Ankalāy, and 'Alī b. Abān and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' to prevent this. Each of them was to take his shift on the same day. Should the troops of al-Muwaffaq outnumber them, the three were to pool their forces jointly to repel the attackers. When al-Muwaffaq noticed the gathering of the abominable ones and their joint-effort to prevent the demolition of the walls, he decided to take part in the action personally, thus inspiring his troops' greater dedication and zeal, and increasing their will to endure. This he did, and the battle was joined and became thick and heavy. Great losses in dead and wounded were suffered by both factions. Abū Aḥmad carried on against the profligates for several days without respite, but still his troops were unable to penetrate far into the positions of the abominable ones because of two bridges spanning the Munkā Canal. When the fighting seemed to reach its peak, the Zanj would pass over the bridges and take the road which led them to the rear of Abū Aḥmad's troops. They took their toll of the government force and diverted them from their goal of demolishing the walls.

Then, al-Muwaffaq sought a stratagem by which he would [2033] destroy these two bridges in order to block the profligates from the road they had taken in order to divert his troops when the fighting became intense. He instructed some of his officers from among the pages to go to these two bridges and lay in wait for the Zanj, with the intention of taking them by surprise when they became careless in their watch. He also ordered them to prepare pickaxes, saws and other tools which might be needed to destroy the two bridges and be helpful in speeding up the work. Acting upon these instructions, the pages set off and reached the Munkā Canal at midday, the Zanj appeared, and came forward, hastening to meet them. Among the Zanj hurrying toward them was Abū al-Nidā', with a party of more than five hundred men. Al-Muwaffaq's men and the Zanj force engaged in a battle which lasted until the turn of the day, when the pages of Abū Aḥmad overpowered the profligates, pushing them away from the two bridges. An arrow struck the one called Abū al-Nidā', in his chest. It pierced his heart and felled him. His soldiers shielded his body and carried it away, as they fled. The officers from al-Muwaffaq's pages were thus able to dismantle the two bridges. They cut the moorings and floated the pontoons to the Tigris while transporting the wooden planks to Abū Aḥmad. They returned safe and unharmed. The pages informed al-Muwaffaq of Abū al-Nidā''s death and the dismantling of the bridges, whereupon al-Muwaffaq and the people of his camp became filled with joy. The archer who shot Abū al-Nidā', was granted a generous gift.

Now, Abū Aḥmad pressed the fight against the abominable one and his followers. They razed those sections of the wall where they could penetrate, while keeping the enemy preoccupied in their city in order to divert them from the defense of [2034] their wall. Thus they hastened its demolition. From the wall, they went to the residences of Ibn Sim'ān and Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. All these places fell to al-Muwaffaq's troops, the profligates being unable to defend them and stem the advance of al-Muwaffaq's men. These two residences were demolished and everything in them looted. Al-Muwaffaq's troops also reached one of the markets of the leader of the Zanj. The latter had established it on the bank of the Tigris and named it al-Maymūnah. Al-Muwaffaq ordered Zīrak, the commander of Abū al-'Abbās's vanguard, to set out for this market. The latter moved out with his troops, and went about the task before him. This market was subsequently levelled and laid waste.

Al-Muwaffaq now went to the residence which the leader of the Zanj had established for al-Jubbā'ī and demolished it. He plundered it as well as the adjacent stores of the profligate. Then, he instructed his men to set off for the spot where the abominable one had built a structure which he named the Friday Mosque. The profligates persevered in their defense of this place, as the abominable one had spurred them on imbuing them with the belief that it was incumbent upon them to defend the structure and glorify it. The Zanj believed these statements of his and obeyed his exhortations, so that it was very difficult for the men of al-Muwaffaq to reach their objective. The fight for this place lasted for days; at this point, only the staunchest, most heroic, and persistent of men remained with the profligate. They defended (themselves) with zeal; so much so, that they would hold their positions. If one (of them) were hit by an arrow or sustained the blow of a spear or were struck by a sword, and fell, his neighbor would draw him aside and take up his position; they feared that if the position of any man [2035] remained empty, (then) ill would befall the rest of his companions.

When Abū Aḥmad saw the endurance and defensive posture of this group, and that their resistance would last for days, he instructed Abū al-ʿAbbās to move to the strongest side of the building which the abominable one called the mosque, and to recruit for that purpose his most valiant troops and pages. He attached sappers to them, men who had been assigned to demolition duty. If preparations were made to demolish something, they would rush to carry out their task. Al-Muwaffaq ordered ladders placed against the walls, which archers climbed and then launched showers of arrows upon the profligates behind the walls. He spread his infantry from the limits of al-Jubbāʾī's residence to the position where he had assigned Abū al-ʿAbbās. Then he distributed money, medallions, and bracelets among those who rushed to demolish the walls and markets of the profligate, and the houses of his companions. What had been difficult before now. became easy after a long and violent fight—the building which the abominable one had named the mosque was demolished. The government troops reached its pulpit and carried it away, delivering it to al-Muwaffaq, who returned with it to al-Muwaffaqiyyah, in good spirits and happy. Then, al-Muwaffaq returned to the task of demolishing the walls, destroying the section (that ran) from Ankalāy's residence to that of al-Jubbāʾī. Al-Muwaffaq's men came upon some of the administrative offices and storehouses belonging to the abominable one; they were subsequently plundered and set to the torch. These events happened on a day of thick fog which obscured vision, so that the men could hardly see one another. This day was the beginning of victory for al-Muwaffaq. In the midst of the fighting a profligate arrow launched by Qarṭās, a Greek page who was with the rebel, struck al-Muwaffaq in the chest. That happened on Monday, [2036] the twenty-fifth of Jumādā II, 269 (January 9, 883). Al-Muwaffaq kept his mishap secret and returned to al-Muwaffaqiyyah. He had his wound dressed that very night, and remained to spend the night at his city. Although his wound bothered him, he returned to the fight in order to rally the spirits of his leading men so that no apprehension or weakness would seize them. Because of this excessive activity, his illness intensified and complications set in; the matter took such a serious turn that it caused concern for his life, and he was in need of the best possible care.

The entire camp, troops and subjects alike became disturbed. Their apprehension about the strength of the abominable one was so great, that one detachment of troops stationed in al-Muwaffaqiyyah left the city because of the fear that seized them. The gravity of his illness became a subject of discussion in government circles. Advisors from among his confidantes urged him to abandon his camp for Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) and leave behind someone in his place. He declined to do this, fearing that the abominable one's scattered forces could be reassembled. Therefore, despite the seriousness of his illness, and the discussion taking place in government circles, he remained. God in his mercy granted him good health, so that after lengthy seclusion he showed himself to his officers and his inner circle, causing them to feel strengthened. He remained in his retreat and continued to recover from his illness until Sha'bān of this year (February 13–March 13, 883). When he recovered and felt able to resume the fight against the profligate, he became aroused, and returned to battle the rebel with his old perseverance.

[2037] When the abominable one ascertained what had happened to Abū Aḥmad, he started to give his men false promises and to stir false hopes. But after word reached him that Abū Aḥmad had reappeared, sailing in his barge, the rebel started to swear from his pulpit that this was an empty and baseless rumor, and what they had really seen in the barge was an effigy which in their confused minds seemed to be Abū Aḥmad.

In this year, on Saturday in the middle of Jumādā I (November 16–December 15, 882), al-Mu'tamid, who set out for Egypt, stopped at al-Kuḥayl[116] to hunt. On Jumādā II (December 16, 882–January 13, 883), Ṣā'id b. Makhlad left Abū Aḥmad, and went to Sāmarrā with a group of officers. Two of Ibn Ṭūlūn's officers, one of them called Aḥmad b. Jayghawayh and the other Muḥammad b. 'Abbās al-Kilābī, proceeded to al-Raqqah.

116. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 240, mentions this place in connection with al-Mu'taḍid's journey to campaign against Khumarawayh in 271 (884/885). It was a large city on the west bank of the Tigris above Takrīt.

When al-Mu'tamid arrived in the province of Isḥāq b. Kundāj—he was governor of Mosul and of the Jazīrah—the latter fell upon al-Mu'tamid's retainers. These were the men who had left Sāmarrā with al-Mu'tamid for Egypt, namely Tīnak, Aḥmad b. Khāqān and Khaṭārmish. Isḥāq had them bound, and seized their money, animals and slaves. He had previously received a letter to arrest them and al-Mu'tamid. Their estates and those of Fārs b. Bughā were conferred upon Isḥāq b. Kundāj.

The reason for his detaining al-Mu'tamid and his retainers is as follows. When al-Mu'tamid arrived in Isḥāq's province, letters from Ṣā'id ordering their detention had already reached Ibn Kundāj. He acted as though he sympathized with them and shared their feelings of loyalty to al-Mu'tamid, sihce the latter was the caliph, and it would be unlawful to oppose him. Now, some of al-Mu'tamid's officers cautioned him to bypass Ibn [2038] Kundāj, warning him that the latter would pounce upon them. But he insisted on stopping, as recorded above, saying, "Isḥāq is my mawlā and page. I want to hunt, and on the way to him there is bountiful game." When they reached his province, he met and accompanied them, reportedly to offer al-Mu'tamid hospitality before he passed into the province of Ibn Ṭūlūn. The next day, early in the morning, the retainers, pages, and the others who were with al-Mu'tamid and those who left Sāmarrā with him started to saddle their animals. Ibn Kundāj remained with al-Mu'tamid's officers, and said to them, "Now, you have neared the domain of Ibn Ṭūlūn and his commander who is stationed in al-Raqqah. As soon as you reach him, the power will be his and you'll be in his hands, as if you were one of his soldiers. Would you be content with this, knowing that he is one of you?"[117] They argued over this until daybreak. Al-Mu'tamid was not yet ready to depart, for his captains were involved in this argument in his presence without coming to any agreement. Then Ibn Kundāj suggested: "Let's go and discuss the matter at some other place, and let's respect the honor of the Commander of the Faithful and not raise our voices here." Clutching their hands, he took them out of al-Mu'tamid's tent and led them into his own. No other tent remained; all the tents but his had been removed. According to instructions he had forwarded to his attendants, pages, retainers and men, they were not to leave the place before he did. As soon as they entered Ibn Kundāj's tent, the bravest of his pages and troops entered into his presence and that of his officers. Chains were [2039] also brought in, and Ibn Kundāj's pages seized and put chains on every one of al-Mu'tamid's officers who had accompanied him from Sāmarrā. After they were all fettered, and he had disposed of this task, Isḥāq b. Kundāj went to al-Mu'tamid and reproached him for leaving his capital[118] and that of his ancestors and for forsaking his brother at a time when he was conducting war against those who were attempting to kill him and all his family, and to abolish their empire. Thereupon, he delivered him and his chained attendants to Sāmarrā.

117. That is, they were equal in rank to Ibn Ṭulūn when he was stationed at the court in Sāmarrā.

In this year, Rāfi' b. Harthamah established himself in districts and villages of Khurāsān which al-Khujustānī had seized. Rāfi' b. Harthamah had taken ten years worth of taxes on advance from a number of districts of Khurāsān, by which he brought destitution upon the people and devastation upon the districts.

In this year, a skirmish took place between the Ḥusaynīs, Ḥasanīs and Ja'farīs. The Ja'farīs had eight people killed in the battle, but they gained the victory and released al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās al-'Abbāsī, the governor of al-Madīnah.

In Jumādā II (December 16, 882–January 13, 883), Hārūn b. al-Muwaffaq appointed Ibn Abī al-Sāj governor of al-Anbār, the Euphrates Road, and Raḥbat Ṭawq. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭā'ī, was appointed governor of al-Kūfah and its environs. He acted as paymaster and collector of taxes there, distributing [2040] the pay in the name of 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, the one known as Kuftimur. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad encountered al-Hayṣam al-

118. The reference here is to forsaking Baghdad. There was a very likely polemical exchange between the partisans of the old capital, and the supporters of the new capital at Sāmarrā. This was also reflected in poetry. See, for examples, the verses of 'Umārah b. 'Aqīl b. Bilāl b. Jarīr al-Khaṭafī quoted by the Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, Ta'rīkh, I, 68 = Paris, 3–4.

'Ijlī in this year. Al-Hayṣam was routed, and Aḥmad auctioned off al-'Ijlī's wealth and estates.

On the fourth of Sha'bān this year (January 18, 883), Isḥāq b. Kundāj brought al-Mu'tamid back to Sāmarrā. The latter settled at al-Jawsaq (the palace) overlooking al-Ḥayr.[119]

On the eighth of Sha'bān (January 22, 883), Ibn Kundāj was given robes of honor. Two swords with swordbelts were conferred upon him, one for his right side and the other for his left, and he was named Possessor of Two Swords (Dhū al-Sayfayn). Two days later he was given a brocade cloak, two sashes, a diadem and a sword; all these were encrusted with gems. Hārūn b. al-Muwaffaq, Ṣā'id b. Makhlad and the officers escorted him to his residence and lunched with him.

In Sha'bān of this year (February 13–March 13, 883) Abū Aḥmad's troops burned down the profligate's fortress and plundered everything in it.

The Reason for This and How Abū Aḥmad's Troops Reached It[120]

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported: When Abū Aḥmad recovered from the wounds which he had received, he resumed fighting the profligate without letup. The abominable one had repaired some of the breaches that had been made in the wall, so that al-Muwaffaq ordered that the area of the breaches be demolished along with the adjoining wall. It happened late one afternoon. The battle had been fought near the Munkā Canal. The profligates were concentrated in this area and were busy fighting [2041] them, as they believed it to be the only active battleground. Al-Muwaffaq set out with sappers he had prepared earlier, and nearing the Munkā Canal, he charged the profligates there. When the fighting became intense, he instructed the oarsmen and captains to move quickly until they reached the canal

119. That is, al-Mu'taṣim's palace. The ruins of this immense structure were investigated by Viollet and Sarre and Herzfeld. A concise account of the palace is found in Creswell, Shorter Early Muslim Architecture, 260 ff.

120. See Popovic, Révolte, 152 ff.

known as the Juwayy Kūr. This was a canal that branched off from the Tigris below the canal known as Nahr Abū al-Khasīb. They did this, and upon arriving there they found the Juwway Kūr free of regular troops and foot soldiers. Al-Muwaffaq drew nearer and sent out the sappers to demolish the section of the wall next to this canal; then he brought up his regular troops, and penetrated his way up the canal, killing many people. They reached some of the profligate fortresses; whereupon, they plundered them, and then set them to the torch, rescuing scores of women who had been (held) there. The government force seized some of the rebels' horses and transported them to the western side of the Tigris. At sunset al-Muwaffaq withdrew safely with the booty. He then returned the next morning in order to resume the battle and demolish the wall. They pushed the demolition of the wall until they reached the residence known as Dār Ankalāy, which was contiguous to the residence of the abominable one. When all of the abominable one's ruses had failed to hinder the demolition of the wall and prevent al-Muwaffaq's troops from penetrating his city, he did not know how to deal with this situation that had gotten out of hand. 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī advised him to let water flow onto the swampy ground on which al-Muwaffaq's troops passed, so as to deny it to them. He also suggested that the rebel dig trenches in a number of places, which would impede [2042] their entrance into the city. If the government forces risked crossing the trench and were defeated, they would find it difficult to return to their vessels.

They did all of this in different sections of their city and along the parade ground which the abominable one had turned into a major road. These trenches now extended near his residence. Now that God had enabled him to succeed in demolishing the wall of the profligate's city, al-Muwaffaq was inclined to fill in the trenches, canals, and places where obstructions had been set up, so as to make them passable for (his) cavalry and infantry. That was what he wanted. But the profligates defended themselves and the fight lasted a long time and without respite, both sides sustaining heavy losses in dead and wounded. One day the number of injured reached almost two thousand; this was because the factions were close to each other during combat, and because the trenches prevented each side from dislodging the other from its position. When al-Muwaffaq saw this, he decided to burn down the abominable one's residence and to attack it from the Tigris. A great many Zanj fighting men, who had been prepared by the abominable one, resisted these moves from his residence. They cast stones and shot (arrows and other projectiles) from bows, slings, ballistas, and catapults from the walls and upper reaches of the fortress. In addition lead was melted down and poured upon the government troops. They did all this whenever the barges neared the fortress. As we have described, it was impossible for the attackers to set the abominable one's residence aflame.

Al-Muwaffaq now ordered that wooden screens be prepared for barges. These screens were covered with buffalo skins [2043] spread over with canvas, and varnished with kinds of chemical substances which would protect them from fire. A number of barges were shielded with screens prepared in this manner. Al-Muwaffaq manned each of these vessels with a force of the bravest lancers and archers from among his pages, and he attached to them a team of fire-hurlers. They were assigned the task of setting the profligate's residence on fire, that is, the leader of the Zanj.

On Friday, the seventeenth of Sha'bān, 269 (February 28, 883), Muḥammad b. Sim'ān, the scribe and wazīr of the abominable one, asked al-Muwaffaq for a guarantee of safe-conduct. The reason for this, as reported by Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan, was because Muḥammad b. Sim'ān was one of those who hated the rebel and loathed his company as he knew he was an imposter.

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported: This was why I was friendly with Ibn Sim'ān. Together we would devise plans for escape, but to no avail. But when the siege took its toll of the abominable one, and his men deserted him, weakening his position, Ibn Sim'ān devised a scheme to flee, and informed me about it, saying, "I am willing to leave without child or family, and will save only myself." Then he asked me, "Would you like to do the same?" I replied, "You are right in your decision, for you will leave behind only one small child. The perfidious one will not be able either to assail the child or expose you to shame through it. But as for myself, I have womenfolk, and I cannot afford to expose them to the rebel's cruelty. So do as you have decided and pass on word about me; that is, about my intention to break away from the rebel and my disgust at being associated with him. If God redeems me and my children, indeed, I shall follow you promptly; but should our fates be con-[2044] joined, we shall be together and bear it."

Muḥammad b. Simʿān now sent a representative of his called al-ʿIrāqī, who arrived at al-Muwaffaq's camp and secured for his master the safeguards he sought. Al-Muwaffaq prepared barges which reached Ibn Simʿān in the lagoon on the day reported above, and the latter thus arrived at al-Muwaffaq's camp. The day after Muḥammad b. Simʿān sought safe conduct, which was Saturday, the eighteenth of Shaʿbān, 269 (March 1, 883), al-Muwaffaq resumed the conflict against the abominable one, dressed in the finest battle garb and (utilizing the best) equipment. He took with him the barges that had been given screens, as described above, and then went with the rest of his barges and galleys manned by his mawlās and pages. He also took ferries carrying infantry. Al-Muwaffaq ordered his son, Abū al-ʿAbbās to set off for the residence of Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā, that is, the man known as al-Karnabāʾī. This place was opposite the residence of the perfidious one on the eastern side of the canal known as the Abū al-Khaṣīb—it overlooked the canal and the Tigris. He sent him forward to set fire to it and to the adjacent residences belonging to the perfidious one's commanders. In such fashion he would preoccupy the commanders, thus preventing them from assisting the rebel and providing him with support.

Al-Muwaffaq ordered the men in the barges which had screens to move to the structures and balconies of the abominable one which extended over the Tigris. This they did, bringing their barges close to the walls of the fortress. They engaged the rebels in the fiercest of battles, and showered them with fire. Although the rebels fought back tenaciously, God granted victory over them and they were pushed back from these balconies and structures which they were defending. Al-Muwaffaq's pages set all this on fire, while the men in the barges remained unharmed from the arrows, stones, molten lead and other projectiles. This was due to the screens which they had fastened to their vessels. In such fashion, they were able to capture the abominable one's residence. Then, al-Muwaffaq ordered all the people of the barges to withdraw; he removed the pages and replaced them with others, while he stayed, expecting the tide to rise. When this occurred, the barges with screens returned to the abominable one's fortress, and in accordance with al-Muwaffaq's orders, they set fire to those elements of the profligate's fortress which faced out onto the Tigris. The fire in these structures raged on, reaching the coverings with which the abominable one shielded his quarters, and the curtains of his doors. The flames became more intense, making it impossible for him and his men to remove anything in his residences, such as his money, stores, moveable furniture and other items. Fleeing, they left all this behind. Al-Muwaffaq's pages and their men stormed the abominable one's fortress and looted everything which the fire had not reached; this included gold, silver, pearls, jewels and other items. A number of women whom the abominable one had had enslaved were rescued. Al-Muwaffaq's pages also reached the other residences of the abominable one and his son Ankalāy, and set them all on fire. Overjoyed with what God had granted them on this day, the troops kept on fighting the profligates in their city, and before the gate of the abominable one's fortress which was near the review ground. The government forces struck a heavy blow against the rebels, killing, wounding and capturing them. [2045]

In the same manner, Abū al-'Abbās attacked the residence of al-Karnabā'ī and the contiguous area, burning, demolishing and plundering. The former cut a massive and strong iron chain which the abominable one had fastened across the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal in order to make it inaccessible to barges. He took this chain and carried it off in some of his vessels. At the time of evening prayer al-Muwaffaq withdrew with the army, completely victorious. On that day the profligate himself suffered losses in wealth, children, and captive Muslim women. The Muslims had hitherto suffered grief because of him, as well as dispossession, loss of kith and kin, affliction, captivity, [2046] break-up of family, and hardship to women and children. His son, the one called Ankalāy was gravely wounded in the stomach that day, and only narrowly escaped death.

On the morrow of that day, which was the eighteenth of Sha'bān, 269 (Saturday, March 2, 883), Nuṣayr drowned.

How Nuṣayr Drowned

Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan reported: On the morrow of that day, al-Muwaffaq rose early to fight against the abominable one. He instructed Nuṣayr, the one called Abū Ḥamzah to set out for the bridge which the perfidious one had constructed of teak wood on the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. This was beyond the two bridges which Nuṣayr had seized. Al-Muwaffaq also instructed Zīrak to go with his troops to the area of al-Jubbā'ī's residence to fight the rebels there, and to send another group of commanders to the vicinity of Ankalāy's residence to do the same. As soon as the tide rose, Nuṣayr quickly sailed forth with a number of his barges into the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, but the tide [2047] carried them and forced them against the bridge. At the same time, without being ordered, a number of al-Muwaffaq's barges staffed with mawlās and pages also entered the canal, and these were also carried by the tide and forced against Nuṣayr's vessels. They came so close to each other that the captains and oarsmen were helpless to cope with what had happened.

The Zanj perceived this, and gathered to attack the barges, surrounding them on both sides of the canal. Panicked with fear, the oarsmen jumped into the water, and abandoned their vessels to the Zanj, who seized them. The Zanj killed some of the fighting men, but most of them drowned. Nuṣayr fought back from his barge until, in fear of being captured, he jumped into the water and subsequently drowned.

Al-Muwaffaq began his day in combat with the profligates, pillaging and burning their residences, and he continued to hold the upper hand until the day was over. Among those defending the fortress of the perfidious one were Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and his troops. The battle between Sulaymān's men and those of al-Muwaffaq continued without respite as the latter held fast to his position. Sulaymān continued to offer resistance until ambushers drawn from al-Muwaffaq's black pages emerged to his rear, whereupon, Sulaymān was routed. The pages pursued him killing some of his men and capturing others. In this fight Sulaymān was hit in the thigh, an injury which forced him down in a place consumed by fire where the coals were still smoldering. Parts of his body were thus burned, but he was protected by a group of his men as he was about to be captured. Victorious and unharmed al-Muwaffaq withdrew, while the profligates became weaker and more fearful as they saw the end was in sight.

Abū Aḥmad happened to fall ill with arthritis which lasted all through the end of Sha'bān, Ramaḍān (March 14–April 12, [2048] 883) and part of Shawwāl (April 13–May 11, 883). As a result he had to abstain from fighting the profligate. But as soon as he recovered, he gave the order to prepare everything necessary to encounter the profligates, and all his men prepared for that task.

In this year, 'Īsā b. al-Shaykh b. al-Salīl passed away.

In this year, al-Mu'tamid cursed Ibn Ṭūlūn from the Dār al-'Āmmah[121] and gave instructions that the same be done from the pulpits. On Friday, Ja'far al-Mufawwaḍ went to the Friday Mosque and cursed Ibn Ṭūlūn. All the provinces held by Ibn Ṭūlūn were given to Isḥāq b. Kundāj, who was appointed governor of all the regions extending from Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah[122] to Ifrīqiyyah. He was also made responsible for the security of the Caliph's personal force (shurṭat al-khāṣṣah).

In Ramaḍān (March 14–April 12, 883), Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn sent a message to the people of Syria urging them to assist his deputy. An express messenger seeking Ibn Ṭūlūn with dispatches from his deputy Jawwāb was apprehended. Jawwāb was also seized and imprisoned, and his money, slaves and animals were seized.

In Shawwāl (April 13–May 11, 883), a skirmish took place

121. That is, that chamber where the Caliph gave public audiences.

122. Al-Shammāsiyyah was, at the time, a staging ground for the 'Abbāsid armies just north of the settled areas in East Baghdad. The expression would seem to be a metaphor for 'Abbāsid rule extending from the capital westward. For al-Shammāsiyyah, see Lassner, Topography, index, 322.

between Ibn Abī al-Sāj and the tribesmen, in which the former was routed. Later he attacked them by night, killing some of them and taking others captive. He then sent the heads of the dead and also the captives to Baghdad. They arrived in Shawwāl of 269 (April 13–May 11, 883).

On the eighteenth of Shawwāl this year (Tuesday, April 30, 883), Ja'far al-Mufawwaḍ appointed Ṣā'id b. Makhlad governor of Shahrazūr,[123] Darābādh,[124] al-Sāmaghān,[125] Ḥulwān, Māsabadhān,[126] Mihrijānqadhaq and the Euphrates districts. He also as-[2049] signed to him Mūsā b. Bughā's commanders except for Aḥmad b. Mūsā, Kayghalagh, Isḥāq b. Kundājīq and Asātakīn. On Saturday the twenty-second of Shawwāl (May 11, 883), Ṣā'id, in turn, delegated the government of the provinces which he received from al-Mufawwaḍ to Lu'lu'. He also sent a message to Ibn Abī al-Sāj confirming him as governor of the provinces he was ruling on behalf of Hārūn b. al-Muwaffaq, namely, al-Anbār, the Euphrates Road, and Raḥbat Ṭawq b. Mālik. Ibn Abī al-Sāj had departed there in the month of Ramaḍān (March 14–April 12, 883). As soon as all these lands were added to Ṣā'id's domains, Ṣā'id confirmed Ibn Abī al-Sāj in his territory.

Toward the end of Shawwāl (April 13–May 11, 883), Ibn Abī al-Sāj entered Raḥbat Ṭawq b. Mālik after its inhabitants came out against him. He overwhelmed them, and Aḥmad b. Mālik b. Ṭawq fled from there to Damascus. Thereupon, Ibn Abī al-Sāj went to Qarqīsiyyā and entered the city. It had been evacuated by Ibn Ṣafwān al-'Uqaylī.

On Tuesday, the tenth of Shawwāl (Monday night, April 15, 883), a battle took place in the profligate's city between Abū Aḥmad and the Zanj. In this engagement Abū Aḥmad obtained his desired objective.

The Reason for This Battle and What Transpired

According to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan: While al-Muwaffaq was preoccupied by his sickness, the abominable one, the en-123. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 340.

124. Ibid., 364.
125. Ibid., 340.
126. Op. cit., IV, 392.

emy of God, restored the bridge into which Nuṣayr's barges had run. He added those elements to the bridge which he thought strengthened it. Beyond it he erected interlocking teakwood stakes and overlaid them with iron. In front of this he put a barricade of stones to narrow the entrance for the [2050] barges and to cause a whirling current in the canal known as Abū al-Khaṣīb so that people would dread entering it.

Al-Muwaffaq recruited two officers from among his pages—they commanded four thousand men—and instructed them to go to the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal; one of them was to travel along the eastern side of the canal and the other along the western side. They were to march to the bridge which the rebel had restored, and to the dam which he had erected in front of it. Having done this, they were then to combat the troops of the abominable one in the area of the bridge and dislodge them from it. He assigned carpenters and sappers to them in order to dismantle the bridge and the stakes that had been put in front of it. At his command, boats were also made ready and filled with reeds doused in naphtha. These would enter this canal—the one called Abū al-Khaṣīb—and when the tide rose, they would be put to the torch, setting the bridge on fire.

On that day al-Muwaffaq rode out with the army until he reached the mouth of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. He ordered that the fighting men be sent ashore at a number of places above and below the abominable one's camp in order to divert the rebel troops from assisting those defending the bridge. The two officers and their troops advanced and were met by the men of the perifidious one, a force of Zanj troops and others. They were led by his son Ankalāy, 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī, and Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. The two forces then engaged in fighting. The battle was protracted, with the profligates fighting violently in defense of their bridge. They understood that dismantling this bridge could bring calamity upon them, and that the two pontoon bridges which the abominable one had established beyond it on the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal would now be- [2051] come a target easy to reach. The number of killed and wounded grew for both factions and the battle lasted until the time of the afternoon prayer. Then al-Muwaffaq's pages dislodged the rebels from the bridge and crossed over it. The carpenters and workers cut the bridge loose, and they dismantled it as well as the aforementioned stakes. The profligate had constructed the bridge and stakes so solidly that it was impossible for the workers and carpenters to dismantle them quickly. Because of this, al-Muwaffaq commanded that the vessels bearing the naphtha-doused reeds enter the canal and be set on fire, whereupon, they would float with the current. This was done, and the ships reached the bridge, setting it aflame. The carpenters were now able to carry out their plan of dismantling the stakes, thereby opening the canal to the men on the barges. The force on the vessels then entered the canal. This raised the spirits of the pages and, driving the rebel's troops from their positions, they chased them until the latter reached the first pontoon bridge behind the bridge. A great many of the rebels were killed and a group of them sought guarantees of safe-conduct from al-Muwaffaq. He immediately ordered that they be given robes of honor and placed in positions where their comrades could observe them. Their compatriots would thus become eager for similar treatment.

The pages reached the first pontoon bridge—it was near sunset. Al-Muwaffaq disliked having his men deep within the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal with the advancing darkness, lest the rebels seize the opportunity. Therefore, he ordered the troops to withdraw safely to al-Muwaffaqiyyah. Al-Muwaffaq now dispatched letters to the districts to be read from the pulpits about the victory and conquest that God had granted to him. He ordered that those of his pages who had distinguished themselves [2052] be rewarded according to their gallantry, their sacrifice and the manner in which they carried out orders, so as to inspire great effort in the fight against their enemies. This was carried out. Al-Muwaffaq now crossed over to the mouth of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, together with some of his mawlās and pages. They crossed in barges, galleys, and skiffs. The abominable one had already obstructed the passage with two stone barriers in order to make the entrance narrow and the current rapid, so that if the barges entered the canal, they would founder about and find their way back difficult. Al-Muwaffaq ordered these two barriers removed, and his men worked at this from sunrise to sunset.

The workers then withdrew and returned the next morning to finish dismantling what had remained. They discovered, however, that during the night the rebels had restored what had been removed. At this, al-Muwaffaq ordered two ballistas installed on two vessels stationed in front of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal; the ballistas had been prepared for these boats in advance. Their anchors were dropped so as to hold them steady. He assigned a team of barge troops to the vessels and charged them with removing these two barriers. The troops of the two ballistas were instructed to fire at any of the profligate's men who drew near to restore parts of the barriers, whether by day or night. The rebels kept their distance, and, after that, the men in charge of removing the stones pressed on until they had accomplished what they intended to do. The route in and out of the canal thus became more accessible for the barges.

In this year, the rebel moved from the western side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal to its eastern side, and provisions were cut off from all directions.

The Rebel's Situation and That of His Men When He Transferred From the West

It is reported that when al-Muwaffaq laid waste the residences of the leader of the Zanj and set them to the torch, the latter took refuge by fortifying himself in the residences further along the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. The rebel camped at the residence of Aḥmad b. Mūsā, who was known as al-Qalūṣ, where he gathered around him his extended family and children. His markets were now transferred to a nearby marketplace, that is the one called Sūq al-Ḥusayn.

His position, nevertheless, became extremely weak, and it became clear to the people that his cause was doomed. They were afraid of bringing provisions to him, and he was thus cut off from all supplies. The price of a raṭl[127] of corn bread in his camp now reached ten dirhams. As a result, the rebels ate barley and then different kinds of grain. This continued until, finally, they started to practice cannibalism.[128] If one of them was isolated with a woman, child, or man, he would slaughter that person and devour the victim. The stronger Zanj then assailed the weaker ones, and when they isolated a weak person, they killed him and ate his flesh. Then they ate the flesh of their children. Following that, they dug up corpses, sold the shrouds, and ate the flesh. The only punishment imposed by the abominable one on the perpetrators of such deeds was imprisonment, but once their imprisonment became prolonged, they were released.

127. One raṭl = 12 ūqiyah. The Iraqi raṭl was 406.25 gr. See Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewischte, 27 ff.; also, see above, nn. 101, 109.

It is reported that when the profligate's residence was demolished and set to the torch, and after everything in it was plundered, he was driven, like a homeless outcast, from the western [2054] side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal to the eastern side. Abū Aḥmad now decided to lay waste the east bank, thereby replicating the conditions which had faced the abominable one on the opposite bank— that is, the western side from which he had been driven. Al-Muwaffaq instructed his son Abū al-'Abbās to take up positions in barges with a group of his men in the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. He also told him to select a team of his troops and pages and land them in the section where the residence of al-Karnabā'ī was located on the eastern side of the canal. Sappers were to be landed with them in order to demolish any houses or dwellings of the rebel's companions which they might come upon.

Al-Muwaffaq positioned himself at the fortress named after al-Hamdānī, who was entrusted with the defense of this sector. He was commander of the abominable one's troops and one of his earliest companions. On the instruction of al-Muwaffaq, a team of his officers and mawlās set off for the residence of al-Hamdānī—they had sappers with them. The place had been fortified with a great body of Zanj and other troops of the abominable one. Protecting it were ballistas, catapults, and Nāwukiyyah bows. A fight began in which many were killed and wounded. Finally the troops of al-Muwaffaq dislodged the profligates, putting them to the sword; a great many of the enemy were killed. Abū al-'Abbās's troops meted out the same to any rebel coming within their reach. Then al-Muwaffaq's troops and those of Abū al-'Abbās joined forces in concerted action against the profligates who fled to the residence of al-Hamdānī. It had been fortified with ballistas, and surrounded on all sides with white flags of the rebel, his name inscribed upon them. Now, it was impossible for the troops of al-Muwaffaq to surmount the walls of this house because they were high and thus inaccessible. They applied long ladders but still they could not reach the top. Then, some of al-Muwaffaq's pages hurled grappling hooks which were attached to long ropes. They were especially prepared for a place such as this. [2055] They fastened the hooks to the banners of the profligate and they pulled. At that, the banners tumbled from the top of the wall, and into the hands of al-Muwaffaq's men. The defenders of that residence were now certain that Abū Aḥmad's troops were on the wall. Seized with fear, they fled, surrendering the residence and everything around it. The naphtha-hurlers ascended (the wall) and set fire to the catapults, the ballistas, and the belongings of al-Hamdānī's residence. They also burned down the surrounding residences of the rebels. On that day, many captive Muslim women were wrested from them, and al-Muwaffaq ordered them transported by barge, galley and ferry to the city of al-Muwaffaqiyyah, and treated with kindness. The battle continued without respite from daylight until after afternoon prayers. A group of the profligate's troops and a party of his special pages, who were his personal attendants and guards, asked for safe-conduct. Al-Muwaffaq granted this to all of them, and ordered that they be treated kindly, given robes of honor and presents and alloted military pay. Al-Muwaffaq returned and ordered that the profligate's flags be hung upside down in the middle of the barges so that they could be seen by his men. A group of those who had asked for safe-conduct guided al-Muwaffaq to an immense marketplace which the abominable one had behind the residence of al-Hamdānī adjacent to the first bridge spanning the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. The abominable one had named the market al-Mubārakah. They told al-Muwaffaq that if he succeeded in burning it down, no other market would be left to the rebels, and the merchants, who were the source of their subsistence, would leave them.

128. Lit. "chase after people."

The rebels would thus feel deserted and compelled to leave seeking guarantees of safe-conduct.

[2056] Al-Muwaffaq was resolved to go with troops to this market and its surroundings from three directions. He ordered Abū al-'Abbās to set off for the side of this market contiguous to the first bridge; he ordered his mawlā Rāshid to go to the market where it was adjacent to the residence of al-Hamdānī; and he ordered an officer of his black pages to go to the market sector adjacent to the Abū Shākir Canal. Each of these detachments did as ordered.

The Zanj became aware of the government troops marching against them and set out to encounter them. The battle was engaged, and the fighting grew heavy. The rebel reinforced his men. Al-Muhallabī, Ankalāy and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and their troops had been fully prepared, and with the arrival of the reinforcements, they fought fiercely in defense of their sector. At the very beginning of their attack, al-Muwaffaq's men reached a point on the perimeter of this market, and set it to the torch. It burned, and the flames spread to most of the market. The two factions fought while the flames enveloped them—the booth coverings above, which had already caught fire, fell on the heads of the fighting men, often burning them. This situation lasted until sundown and the onset of night. Then they stopped fighting and al-Muwaffaq and his men returned to their vessels, and the profligates returned to their tyrant. This was after the market had gone up in flames. Its inhabitants, as well as those merchants with the perfidious one's army and the rabble from the market, fled and reached the upper parts of his city. They had with them money and goods of theirs which they had saved. They had already carried off the bulk of their merchandise and goods from this market, fearing that they would suffer that which befell them on the day God granted al-[2057] Muwaffaq victory at the residence of al-Hamadānī, and made it possible for him to burn down everything he set to the torch around it.

Then, after this battle, the abominable one dug trenches on the east bank and made obstacle courses of the roads, just as he had done on the west bank. He dug a broad trench from the edge of the Juwayy Kūr to the Gharbī Canal. His main concern was fortifying the section from al-Karnabā'ī's residence to the Juwway Kūr Canal, since this sector contained the main residences and dwellings of his men. As a result, gardens and (other) vacated places surrounded by walls and trenches stretched all the way from the Juwway Kūr to the Gharbī. Whenever the battle broke out in this sector, the Zanj rushed from their positions to defend it, preventing the enemy from advancing. Because of this, al-Muwaffaq decided to demolish the rest of the wall up to the Gharbī Canal, which he accomplished after a long drawn out battle.

The profligate was on the eastern side of the Gharbī in a camp in which there were contingents of Zanj and others. They were entrenched behind a protective wall and moats. These troops were the most courageous and valiant of the abominable one's men; they were defending the area adjacent the wall along the Gharbī Canal. During the battle at the Juwayy Kūr and the adjacent areas, they attacked al-Muwaffaq's troops from the rear. Al-Muwaffaq therefore gave orders to set out for this place, take on its defenders, demolish its walls, and dislodge those who were entrenched there. He forwarded instructions to Abū al-'Abbās and a number of commanders drawn from his pages and mawlās to prepare themselves for this task, and they did as ordered. Al-Muwaffaq advanced with troops he had prepared to the Gharbī Canal, whereupon he ordered the barges arrayed from the limits of the canal known as Nahr Juwayy Kūr to the place called al- [2058] Dabbāsīn. The fighting men landed on both sides of the Gharbī Canal, and ladders were put aqainst the wall—the Zanj had a number of ballistas arrayed there—and a fight broke out which lasted from daylight to the afternoon. A number of breaches were made in the wall and the ballistas on it were set aflame, but the parties then desisted from further fighting, neither of them having gained an advantage over the other except that the troops of al-Muwaffaq had succeeded in making those breaches and setting fire to the ballistas. Both parties were severely stricken with suffering and pain from their wounds. Al-Muwaffaq and all his troops then returned to al-Muwaffaqiyyah, where he ordered the wounded treated and rewarded, everyone according to their injury. This was the policy he had pursued in all of his battles from the beginning of his campaign against the profligate until God saw the latter dead.

After this battle, al-Muwaffaq remained where he was for a while. Then, he saw fit to return to this place and deal with it rather than with any other sector, because he perceived how well fortified it was, and he noted the courage and perseverance of the defenders. He realized that he would be unable to gain mastery over the area between the Gharbī and Juwway Kūr canals without first dislodging these troops. So he prepared what he needed in the way of equipment for demolition, and he increased the number of sappers. Then, he selected the fighting men, the archers, lancers, and expert black swordsmen, and set off for this place just as he had the first time. He landed the footmen in places he considered suitable and sent a number of barges into the canal. The battle commenced and raged on as the profligates displayed great persistence, and al-Muwaffaq's troops did likewise against them. The profligates now asked for [2059] reinforcements from their tyrant, and al-Muhallabī and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' came with their armies. This strengthened the enemy's resolve, and they charged al-Muwaffaq's troops. Sulaymān attacked from an ambush in the vicinity of the Juwayy Kūr, pushing al-Muwaffaq's force back to their ships and killing many of the men. Al-Muwaffaq withdrew without seeing his plans through. It had become clear that he should fight the profligates at a number of places, thereby splitting their troops and relieving the pressure they exerted on those coming to this difficult place. In such fashion, he would achieve his objective there.

He decided to renew the assault against the enemy, and instructed Abū al-'Abbās and some other commanders of his to make the crossing, choosing the best of their men. He entrusted his mawlā Masrūr with the canal known as Nahr Munkā, and instructed him to lead his men to this place and to the adjacent hills and palm grove. Masrūr would, as a result, divert the rebels, making them believe there was an attack intended against them from this direction. He instructed Abū al-'Abbās to land his troops along the Juwway Kūr and arrange his barges at these places until he reached the place called al-

Dabbāsīn, which was below the Gharbī Canal. Al-Muwaffaq set out for the Gharbī and ordered the commanders of his pages to set out with their men and start fighting the profligates in their stronghold and fortress. The government troops were not to turn away from them until God granted the government victory, or until they had received new orders from al-Muwaffaq. Then he ordered people to demolish the walls. As they went to (do this), the profligates, emboldened by the two battles which we have reported, rushed forward, but al-Muwaffaq's pages remained steadfast and fought against them gallantly. God bestowed victory upon the government troops, and they dislodged the profligates from their positions. Al-Muwaffaq's men became emboldened and charged the Zanj, putting them to flight. The fleeing enemy vacated their stronghold which fell into the hands of al-Muwaffaq's pages. The latter demolished the stronghold and burned the Zanj residences, looting everything there. They pursued the fleeing enemy, killing a great many of them, and taking captives. Scores of captive Muslim women held in this stronghold were rescued, and upon al-Muwaffaq's instructions, they were removed and treated kindly. Then, al-Muwaffaq ordered the men to return to their vessels. They did so and retired to their camp in al-Muwaffaqiyyah. He had attained his objective in this sector. [2060]

In this year, al-Muwaffaq entered the city of the profligate and set fire to his residences on the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal.

How He Came to Succeed Therein

It is reported, that after he had demolished the walls of this residence belonging to the rebel, Abū Aḥmad wished to penetrate the city. He, therefore, started to repair the paths on both sides of the Abū al-Khaṣīb and at the profligate's fortress in order to make a road wide enough for the fighting men to go in and out during combat. On his instructions, the gate of the abominable one's fortress, the same which he latter had dismantled from the Ḥiṣn Arwakh in al-Baṣrah, was removed and transferred to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām).[129] Then al-Muwaffaq decided to raze the first bridge which was on the Abū al-Khasīb Canal, since this bridge would hinder his troops assisting one another should fighting break out in the area of their camp. So, upon his instructions, a large vessel was prepared and filled with reeds which had been doused in naphtha. In the middle of the vessel a tall mast was set up, which would prevent the vessel from sailing through when it reached the bridge.[130] He seized the opportunity which presented itself towards the end of day-[2061] light when the rebels were careless and scattered about. The vessel was advanced by barges which towed it until it reached the canal where it was set ablaze and released after the tide had risen. The Zanj became aware of this as the vessel reached the bridge. They gathered their forces and flocked there in such numbers that they covered the bridge and the entire area. The Zanj now started to blanket the vessel with stones and burnt bricks, and they deposited earth and poured water on it. The bridge had caught fire and was burned slightly, but some of the Zanj plunged into the water and put holes in the vessel, sinking it, and putting out the fire. They now took possession of the vessel which fell into their hands.

When Abū Aḥmad saw what they had done, he decided to contest them for this bridge until he destroyed it. For that purpose he singled out two officers from among his pages, and ordered them to cross over with all their troops, taking sharp-pointed arms, strong breast-plates, special tools, equipment for naptha-hurlers and tools for demolishing the bridge. Al-Muwaffaq ordered one of the officers to the western side of the canal; he placed the other to the eastern side. Al-Muwaffaq, together with his mawlās, servants and pages, embarked on the 129. On the symbolic meaning of transferring gates from one city to another, see Lassner, Topography, 136–37.

130. Thus far the references to bridges along the Abū al-Khaṣīb have all been to pontoon bridges (jisr) which were easily constructed, dismantled and moved. The reference here may be to a masonry bridge (qanṭarah) or more likely, a permanent wooden bridge since it allowed for clearance. This could be one of the stone barriers spoken of earlier, or a structure similar to it. See text, 2052. It is more likely to have been some sort of wooden bridge since the plan was to set it ablaze. See below, n. 133.

barges and galleys, and set off for the mouth of Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. This happened early Saturday morning, the fourteenth of Shawwāl, 269 (April 27, 883).

The first to reach the bridge was the officer who was directed to the western side of the canal. He charged the profligate's troops who had been entrusted with the bridge. A number of them were killed. The bridge was then set aflame; reeds and other incendiary material had been prepared for this purpose and were dumped on the structure. The abominable one's supporters who had been stationed there now fled. After this, the [2062] government troops which had been sent to the eastern side of the canal arrived at the bridge, and, as instructed, they did their share of burning. The abominable one had ordered his son, Ankalāy, and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' to stand with their armies in defense of the bridge in order to prevent its destruction. When the two did as ordered, al-Muwaffaq's troops, which had been positioned to their rear, set off against them and engaged them in heavy fighting until the Zanj were put to flight.

Thus the government troops were able to burn down the bridge, and they did so. They crossed over the bridge and advanced toward the yard where the profligate's barges, galleys and weapons were manufactured, and they burned absolutely everything, except for a few barges and galleys which were in the canal. Ankalāy and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' fled, and al-Muwaffaq's pages reached a prison which the abominable one had on the western side of Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. The Zanj defended it for part of the day until a group of them were chased away. Then the prison fell into the hands of al-Muwaffaq's pages, who released the men and women detained there. After burning the bridge as ordered, al-Muwaffaq's pages on the eastern side penetrated to the place known as Dār Muṣliḥ. This Muṣliḥ was one of the earliest of the profligate's commanders. They broke into his residence and plundered it. They seized his children and womenfolk, and then set fire to everything they could reach along the way.

In the middle of the bridge there still remained poles which the abominable one firmly fixed. Al-Muwaffaq thus ordered Abū al-'Abbās to dispatch a number of barges to that place, and he did so. Among those sent there was Zīrak with a number of [2063] his troops. Upon their arrival, they sent out people with specially-prepared pickaxes and saws; the poles were cut and then pulled out of the canal. The rest of the bridge collapsed, and al-Muwaffaq's barges entered the canal. The two officers and all their troops moved ahead on both banks of the canal as the rebel's troops fled. At this, al-Muwaffaq and all his men withdrew safely; numerous people were rescued (as a result of all this). A great number of heads of the profligates were brought to al-Muwaffaq, and he meted out rewards and gifts to all those who brought them. Al-Muwaffaq's withdrawal commenced at three o'clock in the morning that day. This was after the profligate and all his Zanj and non-Zanj troops fled to the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, thus completely evacuating the western side, which was occupied by al-Muwaffaq's forces. The latter razed everything that hindered their fighting the rebels; that is, the fortresses of the profligate and those of his companions. They widened the narrow passages through Abū al-Khaṣīb, giving rise to increasing apprehension among the tyrant's men. Scores of his officers and troops, whom he had never expected to desert him, now were inclined to seek safe-conduct (from al-Muwaffaq). As their requests for safety were granted, they deserted in droves and were accepted and treated generously. They were granted military allotments, and given presents and robes of honor according to their rank.

After this, al-Muwaffaq devoted his attention to getting his barges and pages into the canal. He gave orders to burn the rebel residences along the banks and their ships in the water. He wished to train his men to penetrate the canal to make traveling the water course easy for them, because he intended [2064] to burn down the second bridge and advance to the remotest positions of the rebels.

During one of those days in which al-Muwaffaq took the fight to the abominable one, and pressed forward into the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal—it was a Friday, and al-Muwaffaq was positioned at a certain spot of the canal—one of the rebel troops asked al-Muwaffaq for safe-conduct and came to him with a pulpit which his master had had on the western side of the canal. Al-Muwaffaq ordered this man to turn the pulpit over to him—the latter was accompanied by a judge who had served the abominable one in his city. This was the kind of incident that caused the rebels' support to crumble.

Meanwhile, the abominable one had gathered his remaining vessels, those which were seaworthy and others, and placed them near the second bridge. There, he also concentrated his officers and troops and the most valiant of men. Al-Muwaffaq ordered some of his pages to approach the bridge and set fire to the seaworthy vessels that lay nearby. They were to torch as many vessels as possible and seize as many as they could. The pages assigned to this mission accomplished their task. Their operation intensified the rebel's activity in defending the second bridge. He attended to this personally at the head of all his forces, fearing that some ruse was in the making whereby he would be deprived of the western side of the canals. This would give al-Muwaffaq's troops a foothold there, one that eventually would mean the end of him (that is, the rebel).

After the first bridge had been burned, al-Muwaffaq spent several days transporting one detachment of his pages after another to the western side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. They burned the rest of the rebel dwelling places as they came closer to the second bridge. A group of Zanj, who had remained behind in their residences on the western side in the vicinity of the second bridge fought back against the government force. Al-Muwaffaq's pages used to come to this sector and establish positions on the major roads and paths taken by the army of the abominable one. When al-Muwaffaq found that his pages [2065] and troops were familiar with the road and able to find their way along its paths, he decided to burn the second bridge. By that (maneuver) he could wrest the western side of the canal from the abominable one's army and array his combined forces in a single area, without any barrier between the two armies except the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal.

On Saturday, the twentieth of Shawwāl, 269 (May 11, 883), al-Muwaffaq instructed Abū al-'Abbās to proceed with his troops and pages to the western bank. He sent orders for the latter to move out with his force at the site of a building which the rebel had named the Friday Mosque, and to take the route leading to the place which the abominable one had established as a prayer-platform for his festivals. When Abū al-'Abbās reached the platform, he was to turn toward the hill (jabal) named after Abū 'Amr, the brother of al-Muhallabī. Al-Muwaffaq attached to his command officers from among his pages drawn from the cavalry and infantry; together they came to about ten thousand men. He ordered Abū al-'Abbās to position the vanguard under Zīrak at the open expanse of the platform in order to forestall an attack from an ambush that the rebels might have prepared in these places. Al-Muwaffaq also ordered a group of officers from among his mounted pages to spread out among the hills there, between the hill named after Abū 'Amr and the other one named after Abū Muqātil al-Zanjī. They were to do this until they all converged from this range of hills on the place of the second bridge along the Abū al-Khaṣīb. He forwarded instructions to anther group of officers from the pages assigned to Abū al-'Abbās, to go out with their troops between the profligate's residence and that of his son Ankalāy. They were to travel along the bank of the Abū al-Kaṣīb Canal and the adjacent territory, with the aim of joining the forward [2066] groups of pages coming from the hills. Their common cause was the bridge. Al-Muwaffaq ordered them to take along tools, such as iron-bars, pickaxes, saws, and a detachment of naptha-hurlers so that they might demolish and burn everything that they could.

He ordered his mawlā Rāshid to set off for the eastern bank of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal with similar equipment, and then head for the bridge, taking on its defenders. Abū Aḥmad entered the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal with the barges, having already set aside some vessels specially manned with his most valiant pages from among the bowmen and lancers. In addition to the men, he set aside tools necessary to demolish the bridge. Now he sent the force ahead along the canal.

Fighting between the opposing forces broke out on both banks of the canal, and the battle raged. On the western side, against Abū al-'Abbās and his men, were Ankalāy, son of the profligate, and his troops. The latter was supported by Sulaymān b. Jāmi' with his troops. On the eastern side, facing Rāshīd and his force, were the rebel, that is, the leader of the Zanj, and al-Muhallabī with the rest of their army. The battle this day lasted three hours past daytime. Then the profligates were routed and ran without looking about, the swords taking their toll of them. The number of profligate heads taken was so great it could not be counted. Whenever a head was brought before al-Muwaffaq, he ordered it dumped into the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal so that the warriors would stop busying themselves counting the heads and would instead press on in the pursuit of their enemies.[131] Then he ordered the ship commanders assigned to the Abū al-Khaṣīb to approach the bridge and set it aflame, [2067] while turning aside the defenders with arrows. They did so and set the bridge to the torch. At the time, Ankalāy and Sulaymān, wounded and routed, arrived at the bridge, intending to cross to the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, but flames blocked their way. They and the guard which they had with them then threw themselves in the water. A great many of them were drowned, but Ankalāy and Sulaymān escaped, narrowly evading death.

Hordes of men gathered on both sides of the bridge, and it was demolished after a ship filled with blazing reeds was rammed into it, assisting the effort to demolish and burn it. At this, the entire government force scattered about the districts of the abominable one's city on both sides of the canal. They burned down a great number of residences, fortresses and markets belonging to the enemy, and rescued countless captive women and small children. Al-Muwaffaq ordered the fighting men to transport them in their ships and deliver them to al-Muwaffaqiyyah.

After his fortress and dwellings were burned down, the rebel lived in the residences named after Aḥmad b. Mūsā al-Qalūṣ and Muḥammad b. Ibrāhīm, that is, Abū 'Īsā. His son Ankalāy was accommodated in the residence named after Mālik, the nephew of al-Qalūṣ. Now, a detachment of al-Muwaffaq's pages went to the locations where the abominable one resided, and entered them. They set fire to several places and looted everything which the profligate had salvaged from the first con- [2068] flagration. The abominable one fled, but on that day his treasures were not uncovered. Many 'Alid ladies, who had been held captive in a place close to his residence, were rescued, and al-Muwaffaq ordered that they be transported to his camp and treated with kindness and consideration. A group, consisting of al-Muwaffaq's pages and some of those who had deserted the rebels and were now assigned to Abū al-'Abbās, set off for a prison which the profligate had set up on the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. They captured it and released a great many imprisoned soldiers who had fought against the profligate and his troops, as well as other detainees. The prisoners were all taken out in their chains and manacles and brought before al-Muwaffaq, who ordered that their shackles be removed and that the prisoners be transported to al-Muwaffaqiyyah. On that day, all barges, seaworthy vessels, and other boats, large and small, including *ḥarrāqah*s and *zallālah*s, were moved from the canal into the Tigris. These ships, and everything taken from the camp of the abominable one and packed in the vessels, were auctioned off by al-Muwaffaq to his troops and pages. It was a rich and precious booty.

131. They, no doubt, busied themselves seeking heads so as to collect bonuses.

In this year, al-Mu'tamid visited Wāsiṭ; he arrived there in Dhū al-Qa'dah (May 12–June 10, 883) and was accommodated in the residence of Zīrak.

In this year, Ankalāy, the son of the profligate, sought a guarantee of safe-conduct from Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq. As regards the pardon, Ankalāy sent him a messenger requesting [2069] special consideration. Al-Muwaffaq agreed to everything and returned his messenger. In the wake of this event, it was plain for al-Muwaffaq to see why Ankalāy was distracted from war. But the profligate, Ankalāy's father, knew of his son's intention. He reportedly upbraided him until he ultimately caused him to give up seeking safe-conduct. Thereafter, Ankalāy returned to the fight against al-Muwaffaq's forces with added determination, taking part personally in the fighting.

In this year, Sulaymān b. Mūsā al-Sha'rānī—he was a commander in the profligate's army—sent someone to Abū Aḥmad to seek a guarantee of safety on his behalf. Abū Aḥmad refused to grant the request because of al-Sha'rānī's past behavior and his spilling of blood. Then word reached him that a group of the abominable one's companions were frightened by this rebuff to al-Sha'rānī. Abū Aḥmad now let him know that he would grant him safe-conduct in order to appease the profligate's other companions. Al-Muwaffaq gave orders to send vessels to the place at which al-Sha'rānī had promised to appear and indeed, al-Sha'rānī, his brother, and a group of his officers came out to the spot and were carried away on board barges. The abominable one had empowered al-Sha'rānī to defend the lower part of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal.

Abū al-'Abbās delivered him to al-Muwaffaq; whereupon, the latter treated al-Sha'rānī benevolently, granting him safety, as promised, and ordering that he and his companions be given gifts and robes of honor. They were to be paraded on mounts that were saddled and fully equipped, and they were to be entertained sumptuously. Al-Sha'rānī and his men were assigned to Abū al-'Abbās, who included them in the ranks of his troops. Then, Abū al-'Abbās ordered that al-Sha'rānī be placed on a barge, to appear in full view before the troops of the abominable one. This would make them more confident in the promise of safe-conduct. And, indeed, not long after al-Sha'rānī's barges were removed from their position in the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, scores of Zanj officers and others sought guarantees of safe-conduct. They were all brought before Abū Aḥmad, who presented them with gifts and bestowed upon them the same robes and presents as had been granted to those who had preceded them.

With the defection of al-Sha'rānī, the abominable one's grip over the lower part of the camp was loosened and his cause was [2070] undermined and weakened. The latter now charged Shibl b. Sālim with defending the sector formerly assigned to al-Sha'rānī, and sent him down to the lower part of Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. But before the day was over—that is, the day on which al-Muwaffaq displayed the barge with al-Sha'rānī in full view of the abominable one's men—a messenger arrived from Shibl b. Sālim requesting al-Muwaffaq for safe-conduct. He also asked that barges be positioned near the residence of Ibn Sim'ān in order that Shibl and the officers and men accompanying him might set off for them by night. The messenger was sent back with word that the request was accepted, and the barges were positioned at the designated place. Late in the night, Shibl, his household and children, and a group of his officers and men, went to the ships. However, his men had to display their arms, for the abominable one, having learned of Shibl's intention, sent out a group of Zanj to prevent them from reaching the barges. Fighting back, Shibl and his men killed a number of the Zanj, and arrived at the vessels safely. When dawn reddened the sky, the barges had brought them to the fortress of al-Muwaffaq at al-Muwaffaqiyyah. On al-Muwaffaq's order, Shibl was given costly gifts, clothed with many robes of honor and paraded on several horses equipped with saddles and bridles. This Shibl had been one of the abominable one's close associates, among the earliest of his companions, and someone who had displayed great courage and fortitude on the rebel's behalf. Shibl's men were rewarded as well; they were given robes of honor, and along with their master they were granted military allotments and quarters. All of them were assigned to an officer from al-Muwaffaq's pages. Shibl and his men were transported in barges positioned where they could be observed by the abominable one and his supporters. This impressed the profligate and his leading men as they saw their commanders [2071] eager to seize the opportunity and request safe-conduct.

Shibl's advice and sagacity induced al-Muwaffaq to entrust him with carrying out some tactics against the abominable one. Al-Muwaffaq thus ordered Shibl with a team of valiant Zanj deserters, who were especially assigned to him, to carry out a night attack on the abominable one's camp. He singled out Shibl and these men for the task because of their daring and their familiarity with the roads of the camp. Shibl left to carry out this (assignment), setting out for a place which he knew well; and then at dawn he took it by surprise. Here, he came upon a great body of Zanj including many officers and their guards whom the abominable one had arrayed to defend the residence known as Dār Abī 'Īsā. This was the place where the abominable one was quartered at the time. Shibl took them by surprise, killing a great many of them. He also took a group of Zanj officers captive and seized many of their weapons, while withdrawing safely with all his men. They came to al-Muwaffaq, who rewarded them handsomely, gave them robes of honor, and promoted a number of them to a higher rank. This attack of Shibl's men upon the troops of the perfidious one drove deep terror into the hearts of the latter; they feared sleeping and kept vigil in turns every night. They were filled with terror to such a degree that the camp was continuously laden with uneasiness as anxiety overwhelmed them. The commotion and shouts of the nightwatch was heard as far away as al-Muwaffaqiyyah.

Following this, al-Muwaffaq continued to send patrols out against the abominable ones, harassing them day and night on both sides of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. The rebels were thus [2072] kept awake at night and thwarted in their search for food. Meanwhile, his troops were getting familiar with the roads and experienced in penetrating the abominable one's city, and then rushing (to the attack). These persistent raids kept the rebels' camp in a continual state of terror. When al-Muwaffaq felt that his troops had obtained all the training they needed, he decided to cross the canal and fight the profligate on the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb. He convoked a general assembly and called for the presence of the rebel officers who had gone over to his side, as well as the leaders of their cavalry and infantry from among the Zanj and white troops. They were brought to him and stood where they could hear al-Muwaffaq's speech. Then he addressed them enlightening them of their former waywardness, their foolishness and their violation of what is sacred, as well as the apostasy with which the profligate had indoctrinated them. All this, he said, had made their blood licit to him, but he had pardoned them of their sins, forgiven their transgressions, and granted them safety. He further recalled that he had been kind to those who had taken refuge with him, bestowing upon them gifts, granting them military allotments, and assigning them among his leading men and loyal troops. He said that these favors which he bestowed upon them obligated them to obey and follow him. They were not to undertake anything which might be inconsistent with loyalty to God, and the call to loyalty to their ruler obliged them to fight zealously in the holy war against the enemy of God, that is, the traitor and his accomplices. Since, more than anyone else, they were well acquainted with the roads of the abominable one's camp, the danger spots on the thoroughfares of his city, and the places of refuge he had prepared for his flight, it was incumbent [2073] upon them to provide him with good advice and to do their utmost to invade and penetrate (the city of) the abominable one and to reach him in his strongholds, until God helped them overcome him and his supporters. If they did this, their lot would be reward and bounty. Anyone who did not live up to his obligation would be inviting the authorities to lower his position, reduce his status, and depose him from his rank.

Together, they raised their voices, hailing al-Muwaffaq, acclaiming his bounty and proclaiming their true intentions to heed and obey him. They declared their intention to fight his foes zealously as well as their readiness to shed their blood and sacrifice their lives in any task he might set for them. Whatever task he summoned them for only strengthened their intention and showed them that he had confidence in them and that he accorded them a place in the ranks of his leading men. They requested him to single out some area of the battle where they could fight, in order to show the sincerity of their intentions and their hatred to the foe, and to demonstrate that they had wholeheartedly abandoned the errors of their earlier foolishness. Al-Muwaffaq approved their request and let them know of his satisfaction with the loyalty they had manifested to him. They left encouraged by the response given to them—that is, by the kind words and fine promises.

In Dhū al-Qa'dah of this year (May 12–June 10, 883), al-Muwaffaq entered the profligate's city on the east side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. He razed his residence and plundered everything in it.

[2074] The Account of This Battle.

It is mentioned that when he decided to attack the profligate in his city on the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, Abū Aḥmad gave the order to gather the vessels and ferries from the Tigris, and The Great Swamp and the surrounding areas. He did this in order to add them to the vessels he had in his camp, since the latter were not sufficient for his numerous troops. A count was taken which showed that there were about ten thousand sailors receiving their monthly allotments from the treasury. This number included men from the barges, galleys, and boats (raqqiyyah) which usually transported the cavalry. It did not include the vessels for the people of the camp in which provisions were carried, or which they sailed for their personal needs; nor did it include the galleys and small boats (jāribiyyah and zawraq) that were attached to each commander and his personal entourage. These had a permanent crew of sailors.

When the vessels and ferries were fully assembled, and their number proved satisfactory, al-Muwaffaq sent word to Abū al-'Abbās and the commanders from among his mawlās and pages to be ready and able to meet their foe. He gave instructions to assign a number of vessels and ferries to transport the cavalry and infantry. He also ordered Abū al-'Abbās to proceed with his army to the western side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal; then he assigned him some commanders from among his pages with about eight thousand of their troops. Al-Muwaffaq instructed him to go to the rear of the profligate's camp until he passed the residence known as Dār al-Muhallabī. The abominable one had already fortified this place and had settled a great many of his men near there in order to secure the rear of his camp and to make access to it difficult for any attacking forces. Abū Aḥmad then ordered Abū al-'Abbās to cross with his men to [2075] the western side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, and to reach this area from the rear. In addition, Abū Aḥmad instructed Rāshid, his mawlā, to emerge from the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb with a great number of cavalry and infantry, that is, about twenty thousand men. Some of them were to attack at the corner of the residence known as Dār al-Karnabā'ī, the scribe of al-Muhallabī. It was on the point of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, on the east bank. He instructed them to march along the bank of the canal until they reached the residence where the abominable one resided; this was the residence known as Dār Abī 'Īsā. He further ordered a detachment of his pages to emerge at the mouth of the canal known as the Abū Shākir—it was below the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal—while another group was assigned to come out with their men at the mouth of the canal known as Nahr Juwayy Kūr.

All these columns were instructed to move out with the infantry preceding the cavalry, and with all their forces marching towards the residence of the traitor. If God should deliver him into their hands together with its occupants from among his men, and the members of his household and his children, so much the better; if not, they should set off for the residence of al-Muhallabī to be joined there by those who were ordered to cross (the river) with Abū al-'Abbās, thereby forming a single command against the profligates.

Abū al-'Abbās, Rāshid and the other commanders drawn from the mawlās and pages did as ordered; they all appeared and set off on their vessels. This took place on the evening of Monday, the seventh of Dhū Qa'dah, 269 (Sunday, May 10, 883). The horsemen rode out one after the other while the infantry marched. From the noon service on Monday until the end of the late evening service of Tuesday, the ships sailed [2076] along the Tigris until they reached a place below the camp. Abū Aḥmad had ordered that this place be repaired, cleaned, and cleared of rubble and weeds. He filled in its streamlets and canals, so that it would become level and spacious as the outer perimeter was extended. Then he established a tower there and a square for mustering the infantry and cavalry; these he positioned in front of the profligate's fortress. His aim in doing so was to counter the assurances which the abominable one had made to his troops, namely, that he, that is, al-Muwaffaq, would move from his position hurriedly. He wanted both factions to know that he was there to stay until God passed the final judgment between him and his enemy. The government force spent Tuesday night in that place in front of the profligate's camp. The army consisted of some fifty thousand men, including horsemen and infantry. They were handsomely outfitted and sported the finest equipment. The army began to call out the takbīr and tahlīl.[132] They started to recite the Qur'ān and their prayers, and lit fires as well. The abominable one observed the multitude, their equipment and supplies, and it was sufficient to dazzle him and his men.

On Monday evening, al-Muwaffaq sent out the barges. There were one hundred fifty of them, each manned with bowmen and lancers from among his most valiant pages and mawlās. He arrayed them in front of the traitor's camp, from one end to the other, so that they would serve as a battle line for the army behind him; they assumed positions near the bank and cast their anchors. He singled out a number of them which he selected for himself, and assigned to them some special officers from among his pages, so that they would accompany him when he attacked in the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. Then he selected ten thousand cavalry and infantry and instructed them to march along the banks of the canal, emulating his route, taking his positions, and following his orders in the course of the battle.

132. That is, the formulas recited at the time of prayer.

Early Tuesday morning al-Muwaffaq set out to fight the profligate, that is, the leader of the Zanj. He sent each of the commanders to his point of destination, as the army marched out against the profligate and his men. They subsequently encountered the abominable one and his army. The engagement began and both sides sustained heavy losses in dead and wounded. The profligates furiously defended the part of the city to which they were now limited, showing no regard for their own lives. But al-Muwaffaq's forces persevered and gallantly fought back. God granted them victory, and the profligates fled, as the government force inflicted heavy losses upon them and captured a great many of their warriors and brave men. The captives were brought before al-Muwaffaq, who ordered them beheaded on the spot. [2077]

Al-Muwaffaq set out for the traitor's residence with a body of his troops, and arrived there. The traitorr had taken refuge there, concentrating his most valiant men to defend it. But when this proved fruitless, he surrendered it, and his men dispersed. Al-Muwaffaq's pages entered it, and there, left behind, was what remained of the abominable one's money and valuables. They carried off all this and seized his women, his male and female children; their number exceeded a hundred persons. The profligate escaped and fled to the residence of al-Muhallabī, forsaking family and wealth. His house and the rest of his goods and valuables were subsequently set on fire. The rebel's women and children were brought before al-Muwaffaq, and he ordered them transported to al-Muwaffaqiyyah, placed under supervision, and accorded fair treatment.

A group of Abū al-'Abbās's officers crossed the Abū al-Khaṣīb

Canal, setting out for an assigned place at the residence of al-Muhallabī. Without waiting for their troops to join them, they [2078] arrived at al-Muhallabī's residence. Now, most of the Zanj had fled there after their escape from the abominable one's residence. The troops of Abū al-'Abbās entered the residence and busied themselves with looting, grabbing everything that al-Muhallabī had amassed. They also seized Muslim women and the children al-Muhallabī had had by them. Everyone took something and left with it for his vessel in the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. Meanwhile, the Zanj noticed how few al-Muwaffaq's men were, and how they were preoccupied with looting; so they attacked them from a number of places where they had hidden in ambush, and they dislodged them from their positions. The government troops were routed and the Zanj chased them as far as the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. The latter killed a small number of the government horsemen and infantry, and recovered some of the women and valuables which al-Muwaffaq's men had taken.

A detachment of al-Muwaffaq's pages and troops which set off for the residence of the abominable one along the eastern side of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal took to plundering and carrying the booty to their vessels. This emboldened the Zanj who attacked, routing the government troops; they followed on their heels until (they reached) the place known as the Sheep Market (Sūq al-Ghanam) of the Zanj camp. A group of officers from the pages now stood fast with their bravest and most valiant men and repelled the Zanj commanders, giving the rest of the troops a chance to recover and return to their positions. The battle between them lasted until late afternoon, when Abū Aḥmad ordered his pages and their forces to charge the profligates with all their might. They did so, and the Zanj were routed. Al-Muwaffaq's swords found them until they reached the residence of the abominable one. As a result, al-Muwaffaq decided to withdraw his pages and troops, although they held the initiative. He ordered his men to return, and they withdrew aboard. The Zanj, having suffered the effects of the last battle, refrained from pursuing them.
[2079] calmly and quietly. Al-Muwaffaq and the men with him on barges positioned themselves in the canal and protected them, until they embarked on their vessels and brought their horses

Al-Muwaffaq, together with Abū al-'Abbās, the rest of his officers and all his army, left, having plundered the wealth of the profligate and having rescued many Muslim women who had been abducted by the latter. That day, the evacuation of the women began, as they were taken by droves to the mouth of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. They were then transported by vessels to al-Muwaffaqiyyah until the end of the war.

That very day, al-Muwaffaq forwarded orders to Abū al-'Abbās to send one of his officers with five barges along the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal to the lower part of the abominable one's camp. They were to burn an enormous threshing floor which the abominable one used to provision his Zanj troops and others. This was done, and the officer set most of the threshing floor on fire; this action proved to be one of the most significant factors in weakening the profligate and his troops, since they had no other reliable source of food.

On that day, Abū Aḥmad ordered that dispatches should be sent to the regions concerning his victories over the abominable one and his troops. The dispatches were to be read aloud in public, and this was done.

On Wednesday, the second of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 269 (Tuesday night, May 12, 883), Ṣā'id b. Makhlad, al-Muwaffaq's scribe, arrived at the latter's camp, having come to him from Sāmarrā. Arriving with Ṣā'id was an enormous army which, it was said, included some ten thousand cavalry and infantry. Al-Muwaffaq ordered Ṣā'id to give his troops a rest, to have them put their weapons in order and straighten out their affairs, and then make ready to fight against the abominable one. Ṣā'id remained several days after arriving in order to carry out these orders. His force was busy at this when a dispatch arrived from Lu'lu', Ibn Ṭūlūn's commander—it was carried by one of his officers. In this dispatch, Lu'lu' asked for permission to come to al-Muwaffaq and participate in the fight against the profligate. Al-Muwaffaq agreed to this and granted Lu'lu' permission to come. Anticipating Lu'lu''s arrival, al-Muwaffaq delayed resuming the battle against the rebel as he had decided earlier. [2080]

Lu'lu' was stationed in al-Raqqah with an enormous army consisting of men from Farghānah, Turks, troops from Bilād al-Rūm, Berbers, blacks and others, all the choicest troops of Ibn Ṭūlūn.

When Abū Aḥmad's letter with permission to come reached Lu'lu', the latter left Diyār Muḍar and came to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) with his men. He remained there for some time; and then departed for Abū Aḥmad, reaching the latter in his camp on Thursday, the second of al-Muḥarram, 270 (July 12, 883). Abū Aḥmad held an audience for him which was attended by the former's son Abū al-'Abbās, Ṣā'id, and the officers according to their rank. Lu'lu', in fine attire, was brought to him, whereupon, Abū al-' Abbās ordered Lu'lu' accommodated in a camp quarter which was especially prepared for him opposite the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. After Lu'lu' and his men settled there, Abū al-'Abbās ordered him to come, together with his officers and men, to al-Muwaffaq's quarters. He was to appear early next morning in order to salute al-Muwaffaq. Friday morning, on the third of al-Muḥarram (July 13, 883), Lu'lu' and his men appeared in great numbers. He arrived in al-Muwaffaq's presence and saluted him. Al-Muwaffaq drew him near and made generous promises to him and his companions, and ordered that Lu'lu' and one hundred fifty of his officers be given robes of honor, and be paraded with numerous horses bearing saddles and harnesses set in gold and silver. In front of Lu'lu' were one hundred pages who were required to carry different kinds of garments and purses of money. Al-Muwaffaq also ordered that Lu'lu''s officers be presented with gifts and gar-[2081] ments, each according to his rank. He further bestowed upon Lu'lu' great estates and, in the most auspicious of circumstances, he sent him off to his camp in front of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal where lodging and fodder had been prepared for him and his men.

Abū al-'Abbās requested Lu'lu' to present him with the roster of his troops indicating the sums of their allotments according to rank, and when these registers were presented, he doubled everyone's allowance. At the same time, he assigned salaries to them and paid them according to the place inscribed on the roster. Then, Abū al-'Abbās instructed Lu'lu' to make ready and prepare to cross to the western side of the Tigris to fight against the profligate and his men.

After he had lost his control over the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, and his masonry and pontoon bridges there had been cut, the abominable one constructed a dam which extended from both banks of the canal. In the middle of the dam he constructed a narrow opening, so that the current through it would become swift and hinder the barges from entering during the ebbtide and from exiting during the rising tide. Abū Aḥmad saw that without the destruction of this dam he would be unable to do battle, and he made efforts to raze it; but the profligates intensified their defense. Indeed, they began to strengthen the dam day and night. It was in the middle of their territory and it was thus easy to supply them (that is, the defenders), but difficult to supply those who tried to destroy the dam.

Abū Aḥmad decided to employ the troops of Lu'lu'. One detachment after another would be sent to fight, so that they would get training in fighting the Zanj, and to position themselves on the paths and thoroughfares of the enemy city. He thus ordered Lu'lu', to be present with a detachment of his troops in order to participate in the fight for this dam. He also ordered that the sappers be brought along to demolish it. Al-Muwaffaq saw Lu'lu''s bravery in advancing, and the courage [2082] and perseverance of his men, as they disregarded the pain and wounds, and he rejoiced. He was also gladdened when he saw their small force bravely and steadfastly facing the large numbers of the Zanj army. However, seized by apprehension and concern for them, he ordered Lu'lu' to call off his troops. Al-Muwaffaq then bestowed gifts upon them, treated them generously and sent them back to their camp.

Al-Muwaffaq continued to press the attack against the dam, combatting the defense troops of the abominable one with the help of Lu'lu''s men and others. All the while, the sappers worked at demolishing it. The troops fought the rebel and his factions from a number of directions, burning their dwelling places, killing their fighting men, and causing their leaders to seek safe conduct, one batch after another.

Some grounds in the vicinity of the Gharbī Canal were still held by the abominable one and his men. They had the use of fields and meadows, and two bridges spanning the canal by which they could cross over to these grounds. Abū al-'Abbās discovered this and was inclined to march there, so he asked al-Muwaffaq for permission. The latter granted him this, and gave him instructions to select men who were among the bravest of his troops and pages. Abū al-'Abbās did as instructed, and turned towards the Gharbī Canal. He positioned Zīrak and a body of his troops as ambushers on the western side of the canal, and he ordered his page Rashīq to set off with a large body of his bravest and choicest men to the canal known as Nahr al-'Umaysiyyīn, so as to emerge behind the Zanj and catch them unawares. They would then attack the enemy on these grounds. He ordered Zīrak to attack the Zanj head-on when he [2083] perceived them fleeing before Rashīq.

Abū al-'Abbās positioned himself, with a number of barges whose fighting men he had already selected, at the mouth of the Gharbī Canal. He had with him a sufficient number of his white and black pages. When Rashīq emerged to meet the rebels on the eastern side of the canal, he frightened them; whereupon, they moved forward seeking to cross to the western side in order to flee to their camp. Perceiving this, Abū al-'Abbās broke into the canal with the barges; landing his infantry on the banks, he overtook the Zanj and put them to the sword. Many of them were killed in the canal and on its banks, while others were taken prisoner and still others fled. Zīrak and his troops now met them, and they killed all but the few who escaped. Abū al-'Abbās's troops seized arms that weighed upon them so heavily that they could not carry them; they dropped most of them. Abū al-'Abbās now cut the two bridges and ordered that the posts and the wood be dumped into the Tigris.[133] He then returned to al-Muwaffaq with the captives and the heads of the slain which were paraded about the camp. The profligates were thus deprived of the cultivated fields along the Gharbī Canal, fields which provided them with foodstuffs.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year (June 11-July 10, 883), the household of the Zanj leader and his children were brought to Baghdad.

133. This would seem to indicate a wooden bridge. See above, n. 130.

In this year, Ṣā'id was named Dhū al-Wizārataym.[134]

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year, a skirmish occurred involving two officers of Ibn Ṭūlūn and their troops; one of them was named Muḥammad b. al-Sarrāj, the other was called al-Ghanawī. Ibn Ṭūlūn had sent both of them to Mecca, and they arrived there on Wednesday, the twenty-eighth of Dhū al-Qa'dah (June 8, 883), with a force of four hundred seventy horsemen and two thousand infantry. They gave the Jazzārīn and Ḥannātīn two dinārs each and the headmen (ra'īs) were given seven. At the time, Hārūn b. Muḥammad, the governor of Mecca was in Bustān b. 'Āmir.[135] [2084]

On the third of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (Wednesday, June 13, 883), Ja'far b. al-Bāghamardī arrived in Mecca with a force of about two hundred riders. Hārūn met himwith one hundred twenty horsemen, two hundred blacks, thirty cavalrymen from the troops of 'Amr b. al-Layth, and two hundred infantry from those who had arrived from Iraq. Ja'far was strengthened by their presence. Then, assisted by the pilgrims who came from Khurāsān, Ja'far's force met the troops of Ibn Ṭūlūn and killed about two hundred of them in the hollow of the city. The rest fled to the hills, with Ja'far's men taking their animals and money as booty. Ja'far lifted his sword and seized al-Ghanawī's tent—it is said there were two hundred thousand dīnārs in it. He granted a pardon to the Egyptians, the Ḥannātīn and the Jazzārīn. In the holy mosques a letter was read cursing Ibn Ṭūlūn. The people as well as the possessions of the merchants were now safe.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq al- Hāshimī.

Although Isḥāq b. Kundāj was appointed governor of the entire Maghrib, he did not leave Sāmarrā before the year ended.

---

134. That is, "the Master of Two Wazīrates." The reference was to his serving two masters, the Caliph and Abū Aḥmad.

135. Bustān b. 'Āmir was also referred to as Bustān b. Ma'mar. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 611.

The Events of the Year 270

(JULY 11, 883–JUNE 28, 884)

In al-Muḥarram of this year (July 11–August 9, 883) a battle which sapped the power of the leader of the Zanj took place between him and Abū Aḥmad. In Ṣafar (August 10–September 7, 883), the rebel was slain, Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Hamdānī were captured and the entire affair of the profligate came to an end.

The Two Battles[136]

We have already mentioned the dam which the abominable one constructed and, with regard to this, about Abū Aḥmad and his troops. It is mentioned that Abū Aḥmad pressed the fight for this dam without respite until he reached his objective, thus easing the entrance of the barges into the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal both at the ebb and high tide. From the place where he was positioned, it became easy for Abū Aḥmad to do as he wished. This included keeping prices low, making foodstuffs available, and allowing for the delivery of tribute from the provinces. He also succeeded in instilling zeal among his fighting men, in order that they might carry on the holy war against the abominable one and his supporters. Among the volunteers joining him was Aḥmad b. Dīnār, the governor of Īdhaj and the surrounding territories from the districts of al-Ahwāz; he came with a great force of cavalry and infantry. Aḥmad himself, as well as his troops, took part in the fight until the abominable one was killed. Aḥmad was, in turn, followed by people from al-Baḥrayn, reportedly a large throng of about two thousand men, led by one of the 'Abd al-Qays tribe.

136. See Popovic, Révolte, 152 ff.

Abū Aḥmad held an audience for them, and he was visited by their leader and notables, whom he ordered given robes of honor. He reviewed all their men and gave instructions to provide lodging for them. Following them, about one thousand in- [2086] dividuals from the districts of Fārs arrived under the leadership of an elderly volunteer whose patronymic was Abū Salamah. Al-Muwaffaq held an audience for them as well. This old man and his leading companions arrived, and Abū Aḥmad gave them robes of honor and made provision for their lodging. They were then followed by successive groups of volunteers from the provinces.

After al-Muwaffaq succeeded in taking care of the dam, as mentioned above, he decided to meet the abominable one in battle. He gave instructions to make ready the ships and ferries, and to prepare the military equipment necessary for fighting on land and water. He selected cavalry and infantry upon whose courage and valor he could rely, because the places where he would do battle were narrow, difficult and marked by numerous defensive trenches and canals. The number of cavalrymen selected was about two thousand, the infantry were fifty thousand or more. This number did not include the volunteers who crossed over, nor the people of the camp who were not listed on the military roll. He left a large army behind in al-Muwaffaqiyyah, mostly horsemen whom his ships could not carry.

Al-Muwaffaq then sent orders to Abū al-'Abbās to set out with his troops, pages and whatever cavalry and infantry and barges he had attached to his command. They were to set out for the place which Abū al-'Abbās had reached on Tuesday, the tenth of Dhū al-Qa'dah, 269 (May 22, 883). This was the place on the east bank in front of al-Muhallabī's residence. He also ordered Ṣā'id b. Makhlad to attack on the east bank along the canal known as the Abū Shākir. In turn, al-Muwaffaq arrayed his mawlās and pages from the mouth of the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal to the Gharbī. The sector from the residence of al-Karnabā'ī to the Abū Shākir Canal was occupied by Rāshid and Lu'lu', the mawlās of al-Muwaffaq. They had with them [2087] a force of some twenty thousand horsemen and infantry in closed ranks. In the sector from the Abū Shākir to the canal known as Nahr Juwayy Kūr he placed a group of officers from his mawlās and pages, and he did the same in the sector between the Juwayy Kūr and the Gharbī Canal. Al-Muwaffaq commanded Shibl to set out with his troops and the forces which had been added to his command. They were to make for the Gharbī from which they would emerge facing the rear of al-Muhallabī's residence. At the outbreak of fighting, they were to attack from behind it. He ordered the entire government force to march out against the rebel at the same pace. The marching sign was the waving of a black banner which he hung on a place high atop the residence of al-Karnabā'ī at the mouth of Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. Another sign was the blowing of a distant trumpet. The crossing took place on Monday, the twenty-seventh of al-Muḥarram, 270 (Monday night, August 4, 883).

One commander based on the canal known as Nahr Juwayy Kūr started to march before the banner appeared, and he drew near the residence of al-Muhallabī. He and his men were subsequently met by the Zanj who pushed them back to their positions, killing many of them. Because the rest of al-Muwaffaq's force was so large, and because the distance between contingents was so vast, they did not notice what had happened to those who had rushed into the fight. As the officers and their men left for their assigned places, and the cavalry and infantry took up their positions, al-Muwaffaq ordered the flag waved and the trumpet sounded. He himself entered the canal on a barge while the people marched out in successive waves. Encouraged by their success against those who had rushed toward them prematurely, the Zanj who had banded together encountered the troops. The government army met them and struck [2088] with firm, well-calculated blows. After a few skirmishes in which both parties lost many fighting men, they dislodged the Zanj from their positions. Abū Aḥmad's men persevered and God granted them victory over the profligates. The rebels fled, and al-Muwaffaq's troops pursued them, killing some and capturing others. Abū Aḥmad's men surrounded the rebels from all directions. God destroyed countless multitudes of them on that day; and a similar number were drowned in the canal known as Nahr Juwayy Kūr. The troops of al-Muwaffaq took possession of the profligate's city and rescued all the prisoners who were there: men, women and children. They seized the entire households, including children, of 'Alī b. Abān al-Muhallabī and his brothers al-Khalīl and Muḥammad, as well as the household and children of Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. All the captives were then transported to al-Muwaffaqiyyah.

The profligate and his companions, among them his son Ankalāy, al-Muhallabī, Sulaymān b. Jāmi', Zanj commanders and others, fled, setting off for a place which the abominable one had seen fit to prepare as a refuge for himself and his men should they lose control of his city. The place was on the canal known as Nahr al-Sufyānī. The abominable one fled, and Abū Aḥmad's troops triumphed as they did; but the troops remained at the residence of al-Muhallabī, which protruded into the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. The government forces busied themselves with looting what was in the residence and with setting the residence and the contiguous areas on fire. They broke into groups seeking plunder. All that remained to the abominable one and his men had been assembled in this residence.

Abū Aḥmad advanced with his barges for the canal known as Nahr al-Sufyānī. With him were Lu'lu' and his cavalry and [2089] infantry. Abū Aḥmad became separated from the rest of the army, so they thought that he had withdrawn; thus they returned to their ships with their loot.

Meanwhile, al-Muwaffaq and the men accompanying him reached the camp of the profligate and his troops—they were fleeing. Lu'lu' and his force pursued them, crossing the canal known as Nahr al-Sufyānī. Lu'lu' rushed into the water on his mount, and was followed by his men. Then the rebel went on to the canal known as Nahr al-Qarīrī; but Lu'lu' and his force reached him. The government troops attacked the rebel and his cohort and drove them off. The enemy fled, pursued by Lu'lu' and his men, until he crossed the canal known as Nahr al-Qarīrī. Then Lu'lu' and his force crossed behind them, forcing the enemy to retreat to the canal known as Nahr al-Masāwān. The rebels crossed the waterway and took refuge in the mountains behind it. Lu'lu' and his men were the only government contingent taking part in this action. Their zeal in pursuing the profligate and his supporters brought them to the place which we have described, at the end of daylight. Then, al-Muwaffaq gave the order to withdraw and Lu'lu' withdrew, lauded for his action. Al-Muwaffaq took him along in the barges and again, was generous and bountiful to him. In recognition of what Lu'lu' had done in fighting the profligates, Abū Aḥmad also promoted him to a higher rank.

Accompanied by the troops of Lu'lu', al-Muwaffaq returned with his barges to the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. When he came face to face with al-Muhallabī's residence, he found none of his troops; he thus understood that they had withdrawn. Al-Muwaffaq ordered Lu'lu' to move out with his men to his camp, while he himself, seized with anger at his (missing) troops, turned toward his fortress.

Now, Abū Aḥmad was sure of victory, for he saw its signs, [2090] and all the people rejoiced at what God had granted—namely, the rout of the profligate and his men. They rejoiced as well at God's having made it possible to expel the enemy from their city, and seize everything in it, and distribute what had been taken as booty—that is the money, treasures and weapons. Finally there was the rescue of all the captives held by the rebels. But Abū Aḥmad was angry at his men because they disobeyed orders and abandoned the positions in which he had placed them. He ordered that the commanders of his mawlās and pages and the leading men among them be gathered together. When they were assembled for him, he scolded them for what they had done, judging them weak and castigating them in harsh language. Then they made excuses; they supposed that he had returned, and they had not known about his advance against the profligate, nor about his having pressed so far into the rebel's camp. Had they known this, they would have rushed toward him. They did not leave their places until they had taken a solemn oath and covenant that, when sent against the abominable one, none of them would withdraw before God had delivered him into their hands; and should they fail, they would not budge from their positions until God had passed judgment between them and him. They requested of al-Muwaffaq that, after they had left al-Muwaffaqiyyah to fight, he order the ships transporting them to return and, thus, eliminate any temptation to those who might seek to leave the battle against the profligate.

Abū Aḥmad accepted their apologies for their wrongdoing and again took them into his favor. Then he ordered them to prepare for crossing and to forewarn their troops just as they themselves had been forewarned. Abū Aḥmad spent Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday preparing whatever he would need.When this was completed, he sent word to his entourage and the officers of his pages and mawlās, instructing them as to their tasks when crossing (into combat). Friday evening he sent word to Abū al-'Abbās and the officers of his pages and mawlās to set out for places which he, that is, Abū Aḥmad, had specified. [2091]

Al-Muwaffaq instructed Abū al-'Abbās and his troops to set a course for a place known as 'Askar Rayḥān, which lay between the canal known as Nahr al-Sufyānī and the spot where the rebel sought refuge. He and his army were to follow the route along the canal known as Nahr al-Mughīrah, so that they would exit where the canal intersects the Abū al-Khaṣīb and reach 'Askar Rayḥān from this direction. He forwarded instructions to an officer of his black pages to reach the Nahr al-Amīr and cross at its center. At the same time, he ordered the rest of his officers and pages to pass the night on the eastern side of the Tigris, opposite the profligate's camp, and be prepared to attack him in the early morning.

During Friday night, al-Muwaffaq made the rounds among the officers and men in his barge. He divided amongst them key positions and locations which he had arranged for them in the profligate's camp. According to the assigned plan, they were to march towards these places in the morning. Early Saturday morning, on the second of Ṣafar, 270 (August 11, 883), al-Muwaffaq reached the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal in his barge. He remained there until all his men had crossed (the waterway) and disembarked from their vessels, and the cavalry and infantry had assumed their positions. Then, after giving instructions for the vessels and ferries to return to the eastern side, he gave the troops the go-ahead to march against the profligate. He himself preceded them until he reached the spot where he estimated the profligates would make a stand in an attempt to repel the government army. Meanwhile, on Monday, after the army had withdrawn, the traitor and his men returned to the city and stayed there, hoping to prolong their defense and repel the attack.

[2092] Al-Muwaffaq found that the fastest of his cavalry and infantry among the pages had preceded the main force of the army and had attacked the rebel and his companions, dislodging them from their positions. The enemy force fled and dispersed without paying attention to one another, and the government army pursued them, killing and capturing whomever they managed to catch. The profligate, with a group of his fighting men, was cut off from (the rest) of his officers and troops—among them was al-Muhallabī. Ankalāy, the rebel's son, had abandoned him, as had Sulaymān b. Jāmi'. Moving against each of the contingents which we have named was a large force of al-Muwaffaq's mawlās, and cavalry and infantry drawn from his pages. Abū al-'Abbās's troops, assigned by al-Muwaffaq to the place known as 'Askar Rayḥān, met the rebel's fleeing men and put them to the sword. The officer assigned to the Amīr Canal also arrived there, and having blocked the rebels' path he attacked them. Encountering Sulaymān b. Jāmi', he took the fight to him, killing many of his men and seizing Sulaymān. He made Sulaymān a captive and delivered him to al-Muwaffaq without conditions. The people were glad to learn of Sulaymān's capture, and there were many cries of "God is Great!" and great clamor. They felt certain of victory, since Sulaymān was known to be the most able of the rebel's companions. After him, Ibrāhīm b. Ja'far al-Hamdānī, one of the field commanders of the rebel's army, was taken captive; then Nādir al-Aswad, the one known as al-Ḥaffār, one of the earliest companions of the rebel, was captured.

Upon al-Muwaffaq's order, precautionary measures were taken, and the captives were transferred in barges to Abū al-'Abbās.

Following this, those Zanj who had separated from the main body, together with the profligate, assaulted the government force, dislodging them from their positions and causing them to lose the initiative. Al-Muwaffaq noticed the loss of initiative, but he pressed on with the search for the abominable one, [2093] advancing quickly in the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal. This bolstered his mawlās and pages, who hastened to pursue (the enemy) with him. As al-Muwaffaq reached the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, a herald arrived with the good news of the rebel's death; before long another herald arrived carrying a hand, and claimed that this was the hand of the rebel. This seemed to lend credence to the report of the rebel's demise. Finally a page from Lu'lu''s troops arrived, galloping on a horse and carrying the head of the abominable one. Al-Muwaffaq had the head brought closer, and then showed it to a group of former enemy officers who were in his presence. They identified it, and al-Muwaffaq prostrated himself in adoration to God for both the hardships and bounties He had conferred upon him. Abū al-'Abbās, the mawlās and the officers of al-Muwaffaq's pages then prostrated themselves, offering much thanks to God, and praising and exalting Him. Al-Muwaffaq ordered the head of the rebel raised on a spear and displayed in front of him. The people saw it and thus knew that the news of the rebel's death was true. At this, they raised their voices in praise to God.

It is reported that al-Muwaffaq's troops surrounded the abominable one after all his field commanders had abandoned him save al-Muhallabī; the latter now turned away from him and fled, thus betraying the rebel. The rebel then set off for the canal known as Nahr al-Amīr and plunged into the water, seeking safety. Even before that, Ankalāy, the son of the abominable one, had split off from his father and fled in the direction of the canal known as Nahr al-Dīnārī, where he entrenched himself in the swampy terrain.

Al-Muwaffaq retired, with the head of the abominable one displayed on a spear mounted in front of him on a barge. The vessel moved along the Abū al-Khaṣīb Canal, with the people on both sides of the waterway observing it. When he reached the Tigris, he took his course along the river and gave the order to return the vessels, with which he had crossed to the western side of the Tigris at daylight, to the eastern side of the river.

[2094] They were returned to ferry the troops (back) across the river.

Then al-Muwaffaq continued his trip, with the abominable one's head on the spear before him, while Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and al-Hamdānī were mounted for display. When he arrived at his fortress in al-Muwaffaqiyyah, he ordered Abū al-'Abbās to sail the barge, keeping the rebel's head and Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and al-Hamdānī in place, and to take his course to the Jaṭṭā Canal where the camp of al-Muwaffaq began. He was to do this so that all the people of the camp could have a look at them. Abū al-'Abbās did this, and then returned to his father, Abū Aḥmad, whereupon the latter imprisoned Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and al-Hamdānī and ordered that the rebel's head be properly prepared and cleaned.

It is reported that the Zanj who had remained with the abominable one, preferring his company, were continuously arriving (at al-Muwaffaq's camp), and that about one thousand of them arrived that day. Al-Muwaffaq saw fit to grant them safe-conduct because of their numbers and bravery. Otherwise, there might remain among them a group that could become an annoyance to Islām and the Believers. During the rest of Saturday, Sunday and Monday, about five thousand Zanj officers and troops surrendered. Those who had been killed in battle, drowned and captured were so numerous that their numbers cannot be ascertained. A group of about one thousand Zanj, who had been cut off, made for the hinterland. Most of them died of thirst, and those who survived fell into the hands of the tribesmen who enslaved them.

Word reached al-Muwaffaq that al-Muhallabī, Ankalāy, and the bravest Zanj officers and men who followed them, were staying at certain places. So he sent out his most courageous pages to pursue and harass them. When the besieged were certain that there was no escape for them, they surrendered. Al-Muwaffaq seized them and their followers without exception;

there were almost as many of them as those who had gone to al-Muwaffaq and asked him for guarantees of safety immediately after the death of the abominable one. Al-Muwaffaq then ordered that al-Muhallabī and Ankalāy be imprisoned and closely guarded. This was done. Among those fleeing from the camp of the abominable one on Saturday, without any guarantee, was Qarṭās, who had shot an arrow at al-Muwaffaq. He had succeeded in fleeing to Rāmhurmuz, but a man who happened to have seen him in the abominable one's camp recognized him and pointed him out to the governor of the city, who seized him and had him bound. Abū al-'Abbās asked his father to let him slay Qarṭās; the latter was thus handed over to Abū al-'Abbās who put him to death. [2095]

In this year, Darmawayh al-Zanjī asked Abū Aḥmad for a guarantee of safe-conduct. This Darmawayh was, reportedly, one of the most courageous and heroic of the Zanj. Long before his death, the rebel had sent Darmawayh to the lower part of the Fahrāj Canal. The waterway was west of the Tigris near al-Baṣrah. He took up his position there in a rugged place close to The Great Swamp, which was full of palms, thickets and bushes. Using fast skiffs and galleys they had taken for their own use, Darmawayh and the men stationed with him there would intercept travellers. If pursued by the barges, they would enter the narrow canals and take refuge in the thickets. If some of these canals proved too narrow, even for them, they would disembark, carry their vessels over their backs, and seek refuge in inaccessible spots. All the while, they would raid the villages of The Great Swamp and of the neighboring territory, killing and looting whatever they could get their hands on.

Darmawayh and his men carried out these actions until the rebel was killed. At the time, they were in the place which we have described, and they knew nothing of what befell their master. Following the death of the abominable one, the territory around his retreat was conquered, and the people, feeling safe, spread out in search of business, travelling along the Tigris and transporting merchandise. Darmawayh now attacked them, murdering and looting, causing people to be shocked (and frightened). A band of villains and profligates were inclined to do the same as Darmawayh. They made up [2096] their minds to go to him, stay with him and lead the same kind of life.

Al-Muwaffaq now decided to send out a troop of his black pages and others, who were expert in fighting among the thickets and the narrow canals. For this purpose he equipped them with small boats and different kinds of weapons. But while he was completing preparations, a messenger from Darmawayh arrived asking al-Muwaffaq to grant safe-conduct to Darmawayh and his men. Al-Muwaffaq decided to grant him safety in order to put an end to the evil suffered by the populace, because of the rebel and the factions supporting him.

It is reported that the reason for Darmawayh's request for safe-conduct was that among the people he had attacked, there were some who had been on their way from al-Muwaffaq's camp to their homes in Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām)—among them were women. Darmawayh killed the men, plundered their possessions, and seized the accompanying women. When the latter fell into his hands, he interrogated them, and they told him of the profligate's death and that al-Muhallabī, Ankalāy, Sulaymān b. Jāmi' and other field commanders and officers of the profligate's troops had been seized. They also indicated that most of the Zanj had gone to al-Muwaffaq seeking safe-conduct, and that he had received them and treated them kindly. This news confounded Darmawayh, and he saw no way out but to commend himself to the mercy of al-Muwaffaq and ask him to pardon his crimes. So he sent word (to al-Muwaffaq) concerning this, and his request was accepted. When the guarantee arrived, Darmawayh and all his followers went to the [2097] camp of al-Muwaffaq. This was a fine unit that arrived; fully equiped, it had not suffered from the harm and misery of the siege which had been so hard on the rest of the abominable one's troops. The former unit had benefited from the influx of money and provisions taken from others.

It is reported that after he was accorded protection, and he and his people were well treated, Darmawayh gave up all the money and property they had and openly returned it to the owners. This manifested his repentant return to God, and al-Muwaffaq gave him, his leading men, and his officers robes of honor, and bestowed presents upon them. Then, he assigned all of them to one of his pages who was an officer.

Al-Muwaffaq ordered that letters be written to the centers of the Muslim world announcing to the people of al-Baṣrah, al-Ubullah, and the Tigris districts, and to the people of al-Ahwāz and its districts, and the people of Wāsiṭ and the surrounding areas—regions penetrated by the Zanj—that the rebel was dead and they could return to their native lands. These orders were carried out and the populace hastened to do as instructed. They came to the city of al-Muwaffaqiyyah from every direction. After that, al-Muwaffaq remained in al-Muwaffaqiyyah so that the populace would feel more secure and at ease. He appointed al-'Abbās b. Tarkas, one of his mawlā officers, as governor of al-Baṣrah, al-Ubullah and the districts of the Tigris—he had praised him for his behavior and was aware of the fine manner in which al-'Abbās acquitted himself. Al-Muwaffaq ordered him to move to al-Baṣrah and establish his residence there. He also appointed Muḥammad b. Ḥammād over the judiciary of al-Baṣrah, al-Ubullah, and the districts of al-Ahwāz and Wāsiṭ.

Then, al-Muwaffaq sent his son Abū al-'Abbās to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) with the head of the abominable one, the leader of the Zanj. He was to show it to the people, so that they might rejoice. Abū al-'Abbās and his men carried out this order, and on Saturday, the eighteenth of Jumādā I, 270 (November 30, 883), he and his troops reached Baghdad and entered the [2098] city sporting the finest raiment. Upon Abū al-'Abbās's command, the head of the abominable one was brought forth on a spear in front of him, and the populace gathered to view this procession.

The leader of the Zanj began his revolt on Wednesday, the twenty-sixth of Ramaḍān, 255 (August 6, 870). He was killed on Saturday, the second of Ṣafar, 270 (August 11, 883). From the inception of his revolt until the day he was killed, fourteen years, four months and six days passed. His entry into al-Ahwāz took place on the seventeenth of Ramaḍān, 256 (Friday, Aug. 18, 870); his entry into al-Baṣrah, at which time the massacre of its population and the burning of the city took place, was on the sixteenth of Shawwāl, 257 (Thursday, September 6, 871).

The contest between al-Muwaffaq and the rebel became the subject of many poets. Among the works dealing with the subject is the following poem written by Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad al-Aslamī:

I say the harbinger of good tidings brought word of a battle which steadied all that had been shaken in Islam.

May God bestow the highest reward upon the best of men who was so noble to people made homeless and robbed.

When no one appeared to uphold God's cause
He alone restored the faith, which had begun crumbling away.

[2099] He strengthened the Empire when its glory was on the wane and followed this up by wreaking his vengeance on the foe.

He rebuilt devastated and ruined habitations, so that collapsing roofs might be restored.

And cities, despoiled and destroyed repeatedly and turned into desert-land and wastes, be rebuilt.

This battle will bring a consolation to our weeping eyes;
it will bring healing to the hearts of the believers.

The Book of God is read in every mosque;
the appeals of the Ṭālibīs[137] are rejected as comptemptible.

He forsook comfort and friends and pleasures to emerge victorious in the cause of Islam.

These verses are from a lengthy ode. He has also written the following lines on the same subject:

137. That is, 'Alids.

Where are the stars of the heretic, the apostate, indeed he was not one of skill and shrewdness;

Good fortune by the hand of a Prince, whose words are deeds, visited calamity upon him.

The abominable one fell in battle and was left an easy prey to lions of the bush that swooped down on the field;

From the cup of perdition he tasted a drink, a beverage most loathsome to the palate of men.

On the same subject, Yaḥyā b. Khālid said:

O son of the caliphs of the stock of Hāshim, [2100] of those who heap upon people their bounties

And repel the foe assailing the home, of those whose days are marked with battles,

You are a ruler who restored the Faith after it was trampled down,
Who released captives from shackles and bonds;

You are the protector in time of misfortune and unto you the needy [man] turns with his plea.

You extinguished the flames of impiety after they rose high,
O, you, who abundantly metes out both hope and death;

How excellent you are, O offspring of caliphs,
in decisions so wise, with armor so resplendent!

You have destroyed the infidel's hosts. To the ground they fell looking death in the eyes. With a resolute mind

You have showered upon them decisive blows, making their hearts swell with horror.

When the accursed rebel exceeded all bounds you swooped down upon him with the whirling sword and spear.

And you cast him to the ground. Crows fly around him picking the joints and limbs of his body.

He plunged into the depth of the scorching hell, [2101] under the weight of chains wearing him away;

This he earned so justly by his numerous crimes and by the wicked deeds of his own hands.

By saving it from the plotter you delighted all Islām, and rid it of infanticide.

The attack of al-Muwaffaq was dealt in Iraq but this heroic assault terrified those in the west.

Similarly, the verses of Yaḥyā b. Khālid b. Marwān:

Give me a clear answer, O waste habitation whose yards are still flooded by the heavy rain;

Tell me about the people, where have they gone, will they return, will the traveller be back?

But what answer could the ruined home give me, where no sign remained of the dwellers?

The songs of the people of those homes made me weep and plunged me into grief; endurance betrayed me.

As if the camel's shriek came to them with a warning about fatal days with doom in their wake,

[2102] Swiftly and viciously the vicissitudes of fate broke loose upon them, and utmost evil it was, what fate had wrought.

But better times had arrived, and the plant is ripening;
under the auspices of the prince, the world has changed.

To their homes returned all those who had fled, and not even a foothold for Satan remained.

By the sword of the heir-apparent Islām has regained its strength;
true faith has triumphed, and heresy has been uprooted.

Verily, he led the believers in holy war, himself safe and sound and victorious.

This is also a lengthy ode. Yaḥyā b. Muḥammad:

Off with you, I have had enough of you!
do not blame one who is above blame.

Do not blame one for leaving. I am a man bent upon exploit, travel and travail.

Where shall I sojourn when I loath the land as if I were in a nuptial chamber with an evil-eyed bride.

Desire is not aroused if it finds not man awake at the side of his sweetheart.

None passes a night safely who did not know fear at night, [2103] fear of the neighbor's nightly terror.

The meter is also ṭawīl.

In Rabīʿ I of this year (September 8–October 7, 883), a report reached Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) that the Byzantines camped at Bāb Qalamyah, some six mīl (twelve km) from Ṭarsūs;[138] they were a force of some hundred thousand men led by Andrayās the head patrikios. Four others accompanied him. Yāzamān al-Khādim set out against them by night and attacked them, killing the head patrikios and those of Cappadocia and Anatolikon. The patrikios of Qurrah, though gravely wounded, escaped. Seven of their crosses, made of gold and silver, were seized, among them the great cross made of gold and beset with gems. Seized as well were fifteen thousand horses and mules, about as many saddles, sabres ornamented with gold and silver, many vessels (āniyah), about ten thousand brocade standards, heaps of brocade, silk fabrics with ornaments, and sable-fur wrappers. The attack upon Andrayās took place on Tuesday, the seventh of Rabī' I (September 11, 883). The Byzantines were besieged by night and a great many of them were killed. Some people assert that seventy thousand of them were slain.

138. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 167.

[2104] In this year, Hārūn, the son of Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq passed away. This happened in Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) on Thursday, the second of Jumādā I (November 7, 883).

On the sixth of Sha'bān this year (Saturday, February 8, 884), a report reached Baghdad that Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn had died. Some said that his death occurred on Monday, the eighteenth of Dhū al-Qa'dah (May 18, 884).

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd al-'Alawī died in Ṭabaristān, either in Rajab (January 4–February 2, 884) or in Sha'bān (February 3-March 2, 884).

In the middle of Sha'bān, al-Mu'tamid entered Baghdad. He exited from the city (al-Madīnah) and camped opposite Qaṭrabbul.[139] He had set his troops in order, with Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir marching in front of him carrying a spear. Following that, he moved on to Sāmarrā.

In this year, towards the end of Rajab (January 4–February 2, 884), Yāzamān ransomed the inhabitants of Sātīdamā.

On Sunday, the twentieth of Sha'bān, 270 (February 22, 884), the troops of Abū al-'Abbās b. al-Muwaffaq mutinied in Baghdad. Their action was directed against Ṣā'id b. Makhlad, who was then al-Muwaffaq's wazīr. They demanded their allotments; whereupon, Ṣā'id's men came out to repel them. Abū al-'Abbās's infantry went to the plaza at the bridge while Ṣā'id's men were inside the gates of Sūq Yaḥyā.[140] They became locked in battle, and both sides bore losses in dead and wounded; then night intervened. When Abū al-'Abbās's men began their morning's activities Ṣā'id provided them with pay, and they became reconciled with him.

139. One of the four ancient districts of the Baghdad area, the others being Kalwādhā, Bādurāyā, and Nahr Būq. Qaṭrabbul represented the northwest section of the greater urban area. See Le Strange, Baghdad, index, 369 s.v. Ḳaṭrabbul. Also, see below, n. 156.

In Shawwāl of this year (April 2—30, 884) a battle occurred between Isḥāq b. Kundāj and Ibn Da'bāsh. Ibn Da'bāsh was governor of al-Raqqah and its administrative districts. He also ruled the border region and major towns on behalf of Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn while Ibn Kundāj was governor of Mosul on behalf of the central authorities. [2105]

In this year, the waters of the 'Īsā Canal in western Baghdad broke through the dam at al-Yasīriyyah. The waters engulfed the Tanner's Market (al-Dabbāghīn) and that of the teak-workers (aṣḥāb al-sāj) which were situated in al-Karkh. About seven thousand houses were reportedly demolished.[141]

In this year, the Byzantine emperor, who was known as Ibn al-Ṣaqlabī, was killed.[142]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās.

---

140. The reference here is to the area in the general vicinity of the Main Bridge which linked West Baghdad in the area of the Khuld Palace with the eastern neighborhoods of al-Ruṣāfah and the upper part of al-Mukharrim. Sūq Yaḥyā was situated in the Bāb al-Ṭāq area just below the bridge. See Lassner, Topography, index, s.v. and 203 (Le Strange, Baghdad, Map V).

141. Al-Karkh was the great market suburb (rabaḍ) of southwest Baghdad. It was framed by the 'Īsā and Ṣarāt canals. Al-Yāsiriyyah marks the western limits of this area. See Lassner, Topography, index, s.v.; Le Strange, Baghdad, Maps IV, VI. For the Tanner's Yard see Le Strange, op. cit., 156.

142. The reference is to Vasil, who actually died August 29, 886, that is, 273 A.H. He is referred to previously as Ibn al-Ṣaqlabiyyah.

The Events of the Year

271

(JUNE 29, 884–JULY 28, 885)

It began on Monday, the twenty-ninth of Ḥazīrān, in the year 1195 of the Alexandrine calendar.

The Major Events of the Year

Among these events, in the beginning of Ṣafar (July 29—August 26, 884), a report arrived (at Baghdad) indicating that Muḥammad and ʿAlī, the sons of al-Ḥusayn b. Jaʿfar b. Mūsā b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn, had entered al-Madīnah. The report stated that they had killed many townspeople, demanded money from the populace, and took it from a certain group of the local inhabitants. The dispatch went on to state that the people of the city did not hold Friday services nor did they congregate (for devotion) in the Mosque of the Prophet for four weeks. Abū al-ʿAbbās b. al-Faḍl al-ʿAlawī commented:

[2106] Desolate lies the abode of the Prophet;
O Muslims, I lament over its devastation!

O eye, weep over the station of Gabriel, and the sepulchre, and shed tears over the auspicious pulpit!

And cry over the place of worship which the Prophet had founded in piety, but which is empty of worshippers.

Cry over Ṭaybah upon which God had invoked His blessing by sending thereto the seal of the prophets.

May God destroy the band which has laid it waste obeying a master corrupt and accursed.

On the twenty-fifth of Shawwāl, 271 (Thursday, April 21, 885), pilgrims from Khurāsān who were staying in Baghdad were brought to al-Mu'tamid, who announced in their presence that 'Amr b. al-Layth was dismissed from the office to which he had been assigned. He then cursed 'Amr. At the same time, the Caliph informed them that he had bestowed the governorship of Khurāsān upon Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir. Al-Mu'tamid also ordered that 'Amr b. al-Layth was to be cursed from all the pulpits. This order was subsequently carried out.

On the twenty-first of Sha'bān (Thursday, February 11, 885), Ṣā'id b. Makhlad left Abū Aḥmad's camp in Wāsiṭ bound for Fārs to fight against 'Amr b. al-Layth.

On the tenth of Ramaḍān, 271 (Monday, March 1, 885), Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭā'ī[143] was appointed governor of al-Madīnah and the Mecca road.

In this year, a battle took place between Abū al-'Abbās b. al-Muwaffaq and Khumarawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn at al-Ṭawāḥīn.[144] Abū al-'Abbās routed Khumarawayh and the latter fled from him on a donkey to Egypt. The troops of Abū al-'Abbās took to plundering, and Abū al-'Abbās himself [2107] occupied the tent of Khumarawayh, not thinking that anyone remained to harm him. However, Khumarawayh left ambushers behind to lay in wait for Abū al-'Abbās, among them Sa'd al-A'sar with a group of his officers and men. Abū al-'Abbās's men had already laid down their arms and settled in their quarters when Khumarawayh's ambushers attacked, and the government troops were routed. The government forces scattered and Abū al-'Abbās withdrew toward Ṭarsūs with very few of his men. Everything was lost, the weapons, shields, valuables and money which were in the camps of both Abū al-'Abbās and Khumarawayh; all of it was looted. According to what has been said, this battle took place on Friday, the tenth of Shawwāl (Wednesday, March 31, 885).

143. See Ṭabarī, below, 2039.

144. A village between Ramlah and Damascus. See Le Strange, Palestine, 544.

In this year, Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj, who was governor of Mecca, attacked one of al-Ṭā'ī's pages, the one called Badr—the latter was in charge of the pilgrims—and put him in chains. A detachment from the garrison, assisted by the pilgrims, fought against Ibn Abī al-Sāj until they rescued al-Ṭā'ī's page and captured Ibn Abī al-Sāj. The latter was bound and taken to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām). The battle between them took place at the gates of the holy mosque.

In this year the mob ravaged the Ancient Monastery (Dayr al-'Atīq) which was behind the 'Īsā Canal, stripping it of all its valuables and removing the gates and woodwork, etc. They also demolished part of the walls and the roof.[145] Al-Ḥusayn b. Ismā'īl, the prefect of police in Baghdad on behalf of Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir, arrived and prevented them from demolishing what still remained. For several days he and the mob returned engaged in fighting. Then, several days later, everything the mob had destroyed was rebuilt. The restoration work was reportedly carried out under the auspices of 'Abdūn b. Makhlad, the brother of Ṣā'id b. Makhlad.
[2108] to the place so that the government troops and the mob almost [2108]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā al-'Abbāsī.

145. There were several monasteries in the Baghdad area, but I have not succeeded in identifying this particular one. Perhaps the reference is to the Monastery of the Virgins which was situated near the 'Īsā Canal. See Lassner, Topography, 259, n. 60; also Le Strange, Baghdad, Map IV, ref. no. 30. The reason for the hostility to the Christians seems to be their impertinence in riding animals. See Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 84–85, sub anno 272.

The Events of the Year

272

(JUNE 18, 885–MAY 7, 886)

It began on Friday, the eighteenth of Ḥazīrān, in the year 1196 of the Alexandrine calendar.

Among the events of this year, the populace of Ṭarsūs ousted Abū al-ʿAbbās b. al-Muwaffaq because of a dispute between him and Yāzamān. He left the city in the middle of al-Muḥarram (June 18–July 17, 885), setting out for Baghdad.

On Tuesday, the seventeenth of Ṣafar, 272 (August 3, 885), Sulaymān b. Wahb died in al-Muwaffaq's prison.

On Thursday, the eighth of Rabīʿ II, 272 (September 23, 885), a mob gathered and demolished the repairs which were made to the monastery.

In this year, a heretic established his rule over the road to Khurāsān. He arrived in Daskarat al-Malik,[146] killing and plundering.

---

146. This is not the large village in the area of the Nahr al-Malik, west of Baghdad, but rather the Daskarat al-Malik on the road to Khurāsān near Shahrābān. The Sassanian emperor Hurmuz b. Sābūr b. Ardashīr b. Bābak stayed there frequently and it was subsequently named after him, that is, "the Daskarah of the Ruler [al-Malik]." See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 575.

In this year, a report reached Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) [2109] that Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn and Hārūn al-Shārī entered the city of Mosul. Al-Shārī led the people in the services in the Friday Mosque.

On the twentieth of Jumādā II, 272 (Thursday, December 2, 885), Abū al-'Abbās b. al-Muwaffaq arrived in Baghdad, returning from his battle with Ibn Ṭūlūn at al-Ṭawāḥīn.

In this year, a tunnel was dug from inside the Maṭbaq Prison,[147] and al-Dhawā'ibī al-'Alawī together with two others were brought out. Horses had been made ready for them and remained there all night so that they might come out and make their escape on them, but warning was received and the gates to Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr's city were locked. Al-Dhawā'ibī and the others who fled with him were thus apprehended. Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir wrote about this incident to al-Muwaffaq, who was stationed at the time in Wāsiṭ. The latter ordered him to have al-Dhawā'ibī's hands and feet severed in parts. This was carried out in the police headquarters at the bridge (majlis al-jisr)[148] on the western side of the river. While this took place, Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir sat on his mount (nearby). On Monday, the third of Jumādā II (November 16, 885), al-Dhawā'ibī's wounds were cauterized.

In Rajab of this year (December 12, 885–January 10, 886), Ṣā'id b. Makhlad arrived in Wāsiṭ en route from Fārs. On the instructions of al-Muwaffaq, all the commanders went out to welcome him on his arrival. They dismounted and kissed his hand.

In Wāsiṭ, on Monday, the ninth of Rajab (December 21, 885), al-Muwaffaq, seized Ṣā'id b. Makhlad and his retinue and expropriated everything they had in their houses. Ṣā'id's two sons in Baghdad, Abū 'Īsā and Abū Ṣālih, his brother 'Abdūn, and his staff in Sāmarrā were taken into custody. All this occurred on [2110] one day, the same day on which Ṣā'id was seized. Thereupon,

147. This fortress-like structure was situated in the street of that name between the Kūfah and Baṣrah gates of al-Manṣūr's famous Round City at Baghdad. See Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 240. For a similar occurance in which the iron gates of the Round City were locked to keep escaping prisoners from leaving the structure, see Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh, I, 75-76 = Paris, 14.

148. See above, n. 112.

al-Muwaffaq appointed Ismā'īl b. Bulbul as secretary, limiting him to this function alone.

News arrived (at Baghdad) that in Jumādā II (November 13–December 11, 885), an earthquake shook Egypt destroying houses and the Friday Mosque, and that a thousand dead were counted in one day.

In the middle of Ramaḍān 272 (February 9–March 10, 886), prices rose in Baghdad. The reason for this was that the people of Sāmarrā reportedly prevented vessels with flour from reaching Madīnat al-Salām. Moreover, al-Ṭā'ī did not let the owners of estates thresh the crops and distribute them in anticipation of the rise in prices. In turn, the people of Baghdad prevented olive oil, soap, dates and other foods from being shipped to Sāmarrā.[149]

In this year the rise in prices caused the mob to become disquieted and they rallied to attack al-Ṭā'ī. In the middle of Shawwāl (March 11–April 8, 886), they went from the Friday Mosque to his house, which lay between the Baṣrah and the Kūfah gates, approaching it from the direction of al-Karkh.[150] Al-Ṭā'ī placed his troops on the roofs, and they greeted the mob with arrows. He also positioned his men, armed with swords and lances, at the gate and in the courtyard of his house. Some of the mob were killed and many were wounded, but they did not stop fighting until nightfall. When night came, they withdrew only to reappear early the next morning. Then Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir rode (to the scene) and calmed the people, and had them withdraw.

On Tuesday, the eighteenth of Shawwāl 272 (March 28, 886), Ismā'īl b. Burayh al-Hāshimī passed away, and three days later, 'Ubaydallāh b. Abdallāh al-Hāshimī followed suit.

In this year, the Zanj rioted in Wāsiṭ shouting, "Ankalāy, O Manṣūr."[151] At the time Ankalāy, al-Muhallabī, Sulaymān b. [2111]

149. The economic rivalry between Baghdad and Sāmarrā is a subject that is worthy of attention.

150. This residence seems to have been in the section known as Bayn al-Sūrayn. See Lassner, Topography, 275.

151. On the name Manṣūr (he who is aided by God to win victories) in battle cries, see Lewis, "Regnal Titles", 16 ff.

Jāmi', al-Sha'rānī, al Hamdānī, and other leaders of the Zanj were imprisoned in the house of Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir in the Dār al-Baṭṭīkh at Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām).[152] One of the pages of al-Muwaffaq, Fatḥ al-Sa'īdī by name, was in charge of them. Al-Muwaffaq wrote to Fatḥ, ordering him to send off the heads of the six to him. Fatḥ went to the prisoners and sent them out one by one to a page of his who beheaded them. He then removed the lid of the sewer which was in the house and dumped the (decapitated) bodies in it. Then he covered the sewer with its lid and the heads were sent off to al-Muwaffaq.

In this year, a letter from al-Muwaffaq reached Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir concerning the bodies of these six who were slain. He ordered the latter to hang them for display in the vicinity of the Main Bridge (al-Jisr). Accordingly, the bodies were taken out of the sewer; they had already become swollen, foul-smelling, and parts of their skin had fallen off. They were carried on litters, each litter being carried by two men. Three of the bodies were hung on the west side and three on the east.[153] This took place on the twenty-second of Shawwāl 272 (April 1, 886); Muḥammad b. Ṭāhir rode out to the spot, and the bodies were hung in his presence.

In this year, quiet was restored to the city of the Messenger of God, and it flourished as people gradually returned to it.

In this year, the summer expedition (against the Byzantines) was conducted by Yāzamān.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Mūsā al-Hāshimī.

---

152. The Dār al-Baṭṭīkh (Melon Market) was a fruit market situated at the juncture of Nahr 'Īsā and Nahr Ṭābaq. See Lassner, Topography, 249, n. 10; Le Strange, Baghdad, Map IV, ref no. 42.

153. That is, at the approaches to the Main Bridge on both sides of the river.

The Events of the Year [2112]

273

(June 8, 886–May 27, 887)

On the sixteenth of Rabīʿ I (Sunday, August. 22, 886), a battle occurred between Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf and ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār.

Also, on Tuesday, the ninth of Jumādā I (October 12, 886), a battle took place in al-Raqqah between Isḥāq b. Kundāj and Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj; Isḥāq was routed in this battle.

In this year, messengers from Yāzamān returned from Ṭarsūs with a report that three sons of the Byzantine emperor had rebelled against their father and killed him. They had placed one of themselves on the throne.

On the twenty-second of Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 273 (Friday, April 21, 887), Abū Aḥmad had Lu'lu' bound. The latter had come to him with a guarantee of safe conduct from Ibn Ṭūlūn, and Abū Aḥmad seized his wealth. The money seized reportedly amounted to four hundred thousand dīnārs. It is said, that Lu'lu', exclaimed, "Apart from my being wealthy, I do not know of any other sin I might have committed for which I should deserve what has been done to me."

On the fourteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 273 (Monday, May 12, 887), another battle between Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj and Isḥāq b. Kundāj took place. This time Ibn Kundāj was defeated.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. 'Īsā b. Mūsā b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās.

The Events of the Year

[2113]

274

(MAY 28, 887–MAY 15, 888)

Among the events taking place, Abū Aḥmad departed for Kirmān to do combat with 'Amr b. al-Layth. This took place on the eighteenth of Rabī' I (Friday, August 4, 887).

In Ramaḍān 274 (January 19–February 17, 888), Yāzamān set out on a border raid and reached Maskanayn, where he took captives and booty. He and the Muslims returned safely.

In this year, Ṣiddīq al-Farghānī entered Dūr Sāmarrā[154] and plundered the possessions of the merchants, causing much damage among the populace. This Ṣiddīq was formerly a road guard, but then he turned into an armed brigand of the highway.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī.

154. The upper limits of the city. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 618.

The Events of the Year

275

(May 16, 888–May 5, 889)

Among the events taking place, al-Ṭā'ī sent an army to Sāmarrā because of what Ṣiddīq had done there, and because he had freed his brother from prison—the latter had been Ṣiddīq's prisoner. Al-Ṭā'ī's action took place during al-Muḥarram of this year (May 16–June 14, 888). Later, al-Ṭā'ī (himself) went to Sāmarrā and began corresponding with Ṣiddīq, making promises to him, arousing his ambition and offering him assurances. Ṣiddīq thus decided to go to al-Ṭā'ī under a guarantee of safeconduct. However, Hāshim, one of Ṣiddīq's servants—he he was reportedly a courageous man—cautioned his master against such a move. But Ṣiddīq did not accept his advice, and together with his men, he entered Sāmarrā; whereupon al-Ṭā'ī seized him and those of his men who entered the city. Al-Ṭā'ī [2114] then cut off one of his hands and feet. Hāshim and a group of others were similarly treated and then imprisoned. Subsequently, they were carried on litters to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām); their severed hands and feet had already been displayed before the the populace. They were then imprisoned (at Baghdad).

In this year, Yāzamān carried out a sea raid and wrested four vessels from the Byzantines.

In this year, al-'Abdī became a vagabond and caused trouble in the vicinity of Sāmarrā. He went to Karkh Sāmarrā[155] and looted the habitations of the Ḥashanaj clan. Al-Ṭā'ī then set out against him and overtook him at al-Ḥadīthah. They clashed and al-Ṭā'ī routed al-'Abdī, seizing most of his men. The former then went to the Tigris and embarked on his flyer (ṭayyār) with the intention of crossing the river. But al-'Abdī's men overtook him and seized the anchor of the vessel, whereupon al-Ṭā'ī jumped into the Tigris and swam across the river. As he came out of the river, he shook the water from his beard and exclaimed: "What does al-'Abdī think. Don't I swim better than a fish?" Following that, al-Ṭā'ī camped on the eastern bank, while al-'Abdī was opposite him on the western side.

Concerning al-Ṭā'ī's withdrawal, Alī b. Muḥammad b. Manṣūr b. Naṣr b. Bassām said:

Al-Ṭā'ī came, would that he had not come;
his deeds were evil, certainly, not good.

What with his soft verbiage
he is like a young girl masticating a tough sweetmeat.

In this year, Abū Aḥmad ordered al-Ṭā'ī bound and put in prison. This was carried out on the fourteenth of Ramaḍān (Monday, January 21, 889), thus putting an end to al-Ṭā'ī's career. He had been governor of al-Kūfah and its territories, and [2115] had been responsible for securing the Khurāsān Road. He had also been governor of Sāmarrā, in charge of security in Baghdad and the tax-collector of Bādurāyā,[156] Qaṭrabbul, Maskin,[157] and some of the domains belonging to the notables.

In this year, Abū Aḥmad put his son Abū al-'Abbās in jail, but the latter's troops rioted and took up arms. His pages took to their mounts and, as a result, all of Baghdad was in an uproar. Because of this, Abū Aḥmad (set out for the city) and rode until reaching the Ruṣāfah Gate. He reportedly spoke to the troops and pages of Abū al-'Abbās as follows, "What is the matter with you, are you really more anxious about my son than I am? He is my offspring and it is incumbent upon me to set him straight." At this, the people put away their arms and withdrew. This happened on Tuesday, the sixth of Shawwāl 275, (February 12, 889).

155. See Le Strange, Lands, 52, 54, 55.
156. See Lassner, Topography, 256, n. 46; and n. 139 above.
157. For the district of Maskin near Baghdad, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 520.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī.

The Events of the Year 276

(May 6, 889–April 24, 890)

Among the events taking place 'Amr b. al-Layth was charged with the security at Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) and his name was inscribed on the flags, poles and shields of the police headquarters at the bridge. This took place in al-Muḥarram (May 6–June 4, 889).[158]

On the fourteenth of Rabī' I, 276 (Thursday, July 4, 889), Abū Aḥmad left Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) bound for al-Jabal. The reason for this was, they say, that al-Mādharā'ī, the secretary of Adhkūtakīn, wrote to Abū Aḥmad that his master had an immense fortune there, and that should he come (to al-Jabal), it would pass into his hands. But when Abū Aḥmad arrived there he found none of the wealth which had been reported to him. [2116] When he did not find this wealth, Abū Aḥmad departed to al-Karaj, and from there he went to Iṣbahān seeking Aḥmad b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf; whereupon, the latter together with his troops and family departed from the city, leaving his house and its furnishings to accommodate Abū Aḥmad upon his arrival.

158. These references to 'Amr were later removed in Shawwāl. See Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 99–100; and text above, 2117.

Before Abū Aḥmad left his tent at Bāb Khurāsān,[159] Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj arrived, having fled from Ibn Ṭūlūn. This was after several engagements between them, the last of which had enfeebled Ibn Abī al-Sāj to the point that he could no longer put up a fight, as his force was too small relative to the numerous troops of Ibn Ṭūlūn. Ibn Abī al-Sāj reached Abū Aḥmad and joined him; and the latter bestowed robes of honor upon him, and took him along to al-Jabal.

In the month Rabī' II 276 (August 3-August 31, 890), 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abdallāh b. Ṭāhir was put in command of security at Baghdad on behalf of 'Amr b. al-Layth.

In this year, a report arrived at Baghdad that at Nahr al-Ṣilah,[160](the interior of) a hill bearing the name Tall Banī Shaqīq became exposed, disclosing seven graves with seven perfectly preserved bodies. The shrouds covering them were new and soft, with fringes giving off the smell of musk. One of the corpses was that of a youngster with luxuriant hair, his forehead, ears, cheeks, nose, lips, chin and the places of the eyelashes were free from any blemish. His lips were moistened, as if he had just drunk water, and (his eyes), as if he had just been made up with kohl. There was (the indication of) a blow on his waist. His shroud was put back on him. One of our colleagues told me that he pulled the hair on some of the bodies and found [2117] that it had strong roots as if it were on a living person. It is said that the exposed area of the hill above the graves revealed the likes of a stone basin of whetstone color, which bore an inscription nobody could decipher.

In this year, orders were issued to remove the poles, flags and shields bearing the name of 'Amr b. al-Layth from the headquarters of the police. Moreover, no mention was to be made of his name. These orders were issued on the eleventh of Shawwāl (Friday, February 6, 890).

159. The reference here is not to the Khurāsān Gate of the Round City, but to the gate of that name which was situated at the outer limits of East Baghdad. See Lassner, Topography, index, 319.

160. The Ṣilah Canal was situated in Wāsiṭ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 841.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq al-Hāshimī, who was also governor of Mecca, al-Madīnah and al-Ṭā'if.

The Events of the Year 277

(April 25, 890–April 14, 891)

Among the events taking place, in Ṭarsūs, Yāzamān called upon the people to swear allegiance to Khumarawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn. It is reported that the reason for this was that Khumarawayh had sent him 30,000 dīnārs, five hundred garments, one hundred fifty horses, one hundred fifty rain cloaks and weapons. When all this arrived, Yāzamān called for allegiance to Khumarawayh. Then Khumarawayh sent him fifty thousand (more) dīnārs.

In the beginning of Rabīʿ II (July 23–August 20), there was enmity between Waṣīf, the eunuch (khādim) of Ibn Abī al-Sāj, and the Berbers who were the troops of Abū al-Ṣaqr. They fought, and four of the eunuch' pages were killed, as were [2118] seven of the Berbers. The battle between them took place between the Damascus Gate and the thoroughfare of Bāb al-Kūfah.[161] Then Abū al-Ṣaqr rode over to them and spoke to them, whereupon they dispersed. Two days later they resumed hostilities and, again, Abū al-Ṣaqr rode over and calmed them.

161. That is, on the west side of Baghdad.

In this year, Yūsuf b. Ya'qūb was put in charge of the court of appeals (maẓālim).[162] He gave the order to announce, "Whosoever has an appeal against the prince al-Nāṣr li-Dīn Allāh[163] or against any notable, let him come forward." He then sent word to the prefect of police not to release any prisoners except those on whose behalf petitions had been presented to himself (that is, Yūsuf), and whose release he had seen fit to grant.

On the first day of Sha'bān (Monday, November 8, 890), one of Ibn Ṭūlūn's commanders arrived in Baghdad with a great army consisting of cavalry and infantry.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī.

---

162. He was the judge (qāḍī) of the city. See Ṭabarī III/4, 2161.
163. That is, al-Muwaffaq.

The Events of the Year

278

(April 15, 891–April 2, 892)

Among these events was the battle which took place between the troops of Waṣīf al-Khādim, the Berbers, and the troops of Mūsā, the son of Mufliḥ's sister. The battle lasted for four successive days before the parties to the conflict made peace. Some ten of their men had been slain. This took place in the beginning of al-Muḥarram (April 15–May 14, 891).

Then a disturbance broke out on the east side between the populace of al-Naṣrāniyyah[164] and the troops of Yūnus. During the course of the battle a man was killed; afterwards the contestants dispersed.

In this year, Waṣīf, the eunuch of Ibn Abī al Sāj, left for Waṣīt. He did so on the command of Abū al-Ṣaqr, reportedly, so that he might become of service to him, for Abū al Ṣaqr had conferred benefits upon Waṣīf his men, having granted him gifts and bountifully assigned allotments to them. Word had [2119] reached Abū al-Ṣaqr that Abū Aḥmad was coming. He feared 164. Perhaps this should be read al-Naṣriyyah, referring to the place on the Dujayl Road in West Baghdad. See Lassner, Topography, 253, n. 18.

for his life, since he had embezzled all the money from Abū Aḥmad's treasuries in order to present gifts, presents, and robes of honor to the officers, and for other expenditures regarding them. When he had spent what he had from the treasury, he demanded from the landowners the payment of a year's land tax, and, regarding this demand, he arrested many of them. He assigned al-Zaghal to the task of carrying out this measure, and in doing so the latter treated the people ruthlessly. But Abū Aḥmad arrived before al-Zaghal finished extorting the money, and the practice was discontinued. Waṣīf's departure took place on Friday, the seventeenth of al-Muḥarram (Apr. 30, 891).

On the twenty-eighth of al-Muḥarram, 278 (Wednesday, May 12, 891), a star with a fringe appeared; the fringe later became a hanging lock.

In this year, Abū Aḥmad returned from al-Jabal to Iraq. He was so sorely afflicted with the pain of gout that he was unable to ride. A covered bedstead was arranged for him; he would sit on it, while a servant cooled his feet with cold stuff. The gout became so severe, that the servant took to applying snow. Then his feet were stricken with elephantiasis. Forty men carried his bedstead in two teams, twenty porters in each. At times, his pain became excruciating, and he would order them to put him down. It is said that one day he remarked to those carrying him: "You are annoyed with carrying me, I know; but I wish I were like one of you, bearing a burden on my head, [2120] tired but in good health." He also said while sick, "This is my most complete military roll; a hundred thousand troops are inscribed. Not one of them awoke worse off than I am."

On Monday, the twenty-seventh of al-Muḥarram (May 11, 891), Abū Aḥmad reached al-Nahrawān, where the populace welcomed him. He set sail along the (Nahrawān) Canal, and then on to the Diyālā and Tigris, until he arrived in al-Za'farāniyyah. On Friday night he travelled to al-Firk. It was on Friday, the second night of Ṣafar (May 16, 891) that he entered his residence. On Thursday, the eighth of Ṣafar (May 23, 891), after Abū al-Ṣaqr left his house, rumors spread of his death. Abū al-Ṣaqr had sent orders to guard Abū al-'Abbās and kept him behind several locked doors. He had also taken Ibn al-Fayyāḍ along to Abū al-'Abbās's residence and Ibn al-Fayyāḍ stayed nearby. Abū al-Ṣaqr remained at home that day, while excitement grew on account of the news of Abū Aḥmad's death; but the latter had only fainted. On Friday, Abū al-Ṣaqr went to al-Madā'in and brought al-Mu'tamid and his sons to his (Abū al-Ṣaqr's) residence. Thereafter, he stayed home and did not go to Abū Aḥmad's residence.

Perceiving Abū Aḥmad's condition, those of his pages who were in sympathy with his son Abū al-'Abbās, as well as the leaders of Abū al-Abbās's pages, who were present, broke the locks of the doors behind which Abū al-'Abbās was confined.

The page who had been in the same room with Abū al-'Abbās reportedly said: Upon hearing the sounds of locks being broken Abū al-'Abbās remarked, "They can only be coming to take my life." He seized a sword at his disposal, unsheathed it, [2121] and sat so as to be ready to rise, while keeping the sword in his lap. Then he said to me, "Step aside. By God, they will not reach me as long as there is any life left in me." As the door opened, the first to enter was Waṣīf Mūshkīr, who had been the page of Abū al-'Abbās. When Abū al-'Abbās saw him, he dropped the sword, since he knew that they had come to him only with good intentions. They took him out and sat him before his father, who had just fainted. When Abū Aḥmad opened his eyes and came to, his glance fell upon his son, whereupon he drew Abū al-'Abbās close to him and embraced him.

Al-Mu'tamid, his son, the heir apparent, Ja'far al-Mufawwaḍ ilā-llāh, and his other sons, 'Abd al-'Azīz, Muḥammad, and Isḥāq, all arrived in Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) on the same day that they had been summoned. This was Friday noon, before the Friday service, the ninth of Ṣafar (April 24, 891). They stayed at the residence of Abū al-Ṣaqr. Then word reached Abū al-Ṣaqr that Abū Aḥmad had not died, whereupon he sent Ismā'īl b. Isḥāq on to verify this report—this was on Saturday. Meanwhile, he assembled the officers and troops, and filled his residence and its surroundings with armed men. He did as well for the area between his residence and the bridge. In addition he cut the two bridges.[165] A group stood at the bridgehead on

165. It may be that Abū al-Ṣaqr's residence was on the East Side where the troops were stationed. The bridge referred to was the Main Bridge of the city the eastern side (of the river) and fought the troops of Abū al-Ṣaqr, as both sides suffered losses in dead and wounded. Abū Ṭalḥah, the brother of Sharkab, was stationed with his men at Bāb al-Bustān.[166]

Meanwhile, Ismā'īl returned to Abū al-Ṣaqr, and informed him that Abū Aḥmad was alive. The first of the commanders to turn to Abū Aḥmad was Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj, who crossed the 'Īsā Canal. After that, they started to steal away, some crossing over to Abū Aḥmad's residence, others returned to their homes, and still others left Baghdad. When Abū al-Ṣaqr [2122] saw this and was certain that Abū Aḥmad was still alive, he and his two sons went to the latter's residence. Abū Aḥmad made no mention of what had happened and did not question him, and Abū al-Ṣaqr remained at Abū Aḥmad's residence. When al-Mu'tamid saw that he alone remained at Abū al-Ṣaqr's home, he embarked on a skiff together with his sons and Buktimur. They were then met by Abū Laylā b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf's flyer. The latter sailed with them to his residence which is the palace of 'Alī b. Jahshiyār at the head of the bridge. But when al-Mu'tamid told him, "I want to go to my brother," Abū Laylā took him and those accompanying him from that house to Abū Aḥmad's residence.

Meanwhile, Abū al-Ṣaqr's residence was stripped of everything to the extent that the women had to leave barefoot and without veils. The house of his secretary, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, was also looted and the house of Ibn al-Wāthiqī was plundered and set on fire. Looted as well were the residences of al-Wāthiqī's intimates. The gates of the prisons were broken and their walls were pierced. All the prisoners escaped including all the inmates of the Maṭbaq. The two police headquarters connecting Bāb al-Ṭāq with the West Side near al-Khuld. The city had at different times two or three bridges spanning the Tigris. See Lassner, Topography, 280, n.1.

166. If these men were stationed on the East Side (see above, n. 165), the Bāb al-Bustān (Gate of the Garden) referred to here is likely the Bustān al-Ẓāhir. See Lassner, Topography, 280, n.2.; 295, n. 48.

167. Note that al-Muwaffaq granted 'Alī b. Jahshiyār the famous Ṭāq (Archway of) Asmā' which formed part of the Asmā's palace. It was situated between al-Ruṣāfah and al-Mukharrim and gave its name to the larger neighborhood near the bridge, that is, Bāb al-Ṭāq. See Lassner, Topography, 261, n.3.

buildings at the (main) bridge were looted and stripped of everything. Even the houses in the vicinity of Abū al-Ṣaqr's residence were robbed.

Abū Aḥmad gave robes of honor to his son Abū al-'Abbās and to Abū al-Ṣaqr. They rode together wearing the robes of honor from Sūq al-Thalāthā' to Bāb al-Ṭāq,[168] then they proceeded to Abū al-'Abbās's residence which was the Palace of Ṣā'id,[169] and from there Abū al-Ṣaqr set sail for his home, which had been so thoroughly plundered that they had to bring him a mat from al-Shāh's residence to sit on.

Abū al-'Abbās entrusted his page Badr with the security (of the city). He also appointed Muḥammad b. Ghānim b. al-Shāh [2123] as his deputy on the east side and 'Īsā al-Nūsharī on the west side. This took place on the fourteenth of Ṣafar (Wednesday, April 28, 891).

On Wednesday, the nineteenth of Ṣafar, 278 (June 2, 891), Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq passed away. He was buried Thursday night near the tomb of his mother in al-Ruṣāfah.[170] That same day, Abū al-'Abbās received people who came to express their condolences.

In this year, the officers and pages took the oath of allegiance to Abū al-'Abbās as heir apparent following al-Mufawwaḍ (in the line of succession). He was given honorific title al-Mu'taḍid bi-llāh. That was on Thursday (the day his father was buried). Pay was distributed among the troops, and on Friday, the sermon mentioned the names of al-Mu'tamid, al-Mufawwaḍ and Abū al-'Abbās al-Mu'tadid in that order. This took place on the twenty-first of Ṣafar (June 4, 891).

---

168. Presumably along the Main Thoroughfare (Shāri' al-A'ẓam) that ran from Sūq al-Thalāthā' in the south to Bāb al-Ṭāq in the north. That thoroughfare was frequently used for processions. See for example Khaṭīb, Ta'rīkh, I, 100 ff. = Paris, 49 ff.; Miskawayh, Tajārib, I, 53–55, Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 143–44; Ibu al-Athīr, Kamil, VIII, 79; Ṣabī', Rusūm, 11 ff.; Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 131–139; the secondary literature is listed in Lassner, Topography, 268, n. 10.

169. The reference is to a palace that was to the north of the bridge in the area of al-Shammāsiyyah. It was used as a guest house for important visitors. See Lassner, Topography, 268, n.12.

170. That is , he was buried in the Tombs of the Caliphs. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 193–95.

On Monday, the twenty-third of Ṣafar (June 6, 891), Abū al-Ṣaqr and his intimates were seized and their houses plundered. A search was made for the Banū al-Furāt,[171] who had been in charge of the Dīwān al-Sawād; they subsequently went into hiding. On Tuesday, the twenty-fourth of Ṣafar (June 7, 891), 'Ubaydallāh b. Sulaymān b. Wahb was granted robes of honor and entrusted with the wazīrate.[172]

In this year, Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj sent a message to Wāsiṭ, ordering his page, Waṣīf, to return to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām). Waṣīf went to al-Ahwāz and refused to return to Baghdad. Instead, he plundered al-Ṭīb and caused mayhem in al-Sūs.[173]

In this year, Abū Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Furāt was seized, and subsequently imprisoned. He was also required to give up his wealth. Al-Zaghal was seized along with him, and he too was imprisoned and required to give up his wealth.

In this year, dispatches arrived (at Baghdad) that Alī b. al-Layth, the brother of al-Ṣaffār had been killed. He had been slain by Rāfi' b. Harthamah, who had deserted al-Ṣaffār and joined 'Alī.

In this year despatches arrived (at Baghdad) from Egypt that the Nile's level had dropped and that prices had risen. [2124]

The Origins of the Qarmaṭians[174]

In 278 (891/852), reports arrived (at Baghdad) of a revolutionary group in the Kūfah area (Sawād al-Kūfah) known as the Qarmaṭians. Their movement began with the arrival there of a man from the province of Khuzistān. Settling in a place known as al-Nahrayn, he led an ascetic life and displayed his piety to all. He earned his living by weaving baskets from palm leaves, and spent much of his time praying. He continued this way for some time. If anyone joined him, he would discourse with him 171. For this wazīrial family, see Sourdel, Vizirat 'Abbāside, II, index, 762–63.

172. Ibid., 785.
173. See Le Strange, Lands, 240, 246, 247 (al-Sūs), 241, 247 (Ṭīb).
174. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳarmaṭī (includes extensive bibliography).

upon religious affairs, inculcate him with contempt for this world, and teach him that it was incumbent upon everyone to pray fifty times each day and night. He did this until news spread about his activity in this place. Then he disclosed that he was urging allegiance to an Imām from the house of the Messenger.[175] He went on in this manner attracting people to his side and spreading his message which won over their hearts. He stayed at a greengrocer's in the village. Nearby there was a palm-grove, which was acquired by a group of merchants. The latter built an enclosure in which they stored the fruits they gathered from the grove. They came to the greengrocer and asked him to find them a man who could guard what they had gathered. The greengrocer pointed this man out [2125] to them, and said, "If this man consents to guard your dates, he is just the man you want." So the merchants discussed the matter with him, and he agreed to act as guard for a certain remuneration. He acted as guard for them, spending most of his day at prayers and fasting. For breakfast, he would take a raṭl[176] of dates, and after eating he would collect the stones. When the merchants had loaded all their dates, they went to the greengrocer to settle their account with this hired-hand of theirs, and they paid him what he had earned. Then, the latter reckoned what he owed the greengrocer for his dates, and deducted from that sum the worth of the stones which he returned to the latter.

When the merchants heard what was going on between the man and the greengrocer concerning the date stones, they attacked him, and striking him, they said, "Was it not enough for you to eat our dates, but that now you even sell their stones?" The greengrocer then said to them, "Leave him alone; this man would not even touch your dates." And he told them his story. The merchants now regretted having struck him, and asked him to forgive them. This he did, and, as a result, when they came across his asceticism, the people of the village esteemed him even more.

175. The expression "house of the Messenger [ahl bayt al-Rasūl]" here refers to the family of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. For an analysis of the term ahl al-bayt and the various interpretations of it by 'Alids and 'Abbāsids, see Sharon, "Abbāsid Da'wa," 9, n. 23.

176. See above, n. 127, also nn. 101, 109.

Afterwards, he fell sick and lay abandoned on the road. Now there was a man in that village who drove oxen. He had extremely red eyes; his eyes were so red that the people of the village came to call him Karmītah, on account of the redness of his eyes—Karmītah in Aramaic[177] means "red-eyed." The greengrocer asked this Karmītah to take the sick man to his home and ask his family to watch over him and take care of him. Karmītah did this, and the man stayed with him until he recovered.

Thereupon he would receive townspeople in his home, in- [2126] vite them to join him in his cause, and describe his creed to them. The people of this region responded and he took a dīnār from everyone who joined his religious group—they thought that he took it for the Imām. In this fashion, he continued to summon the people of those villages, and they responded favorably to him. Then he selected twelve agents (naqīb) from among them, and he instructed them to summon people to their faith. He said to the agents, "You are like the apostles of Jesus, the son of Mary."[178]

The farmers of that region neglected their work because of the fifty prayers he prescribed for them, and which he had declared incumbent upon them. Al-Hayṣam happened to have estates in this area. When he noticed that his farmers had become remiss in the tilling of the soil, he inquired about it and was informed that a man had appeared and revealed religious practices (madhhab min al-dīn) to them. He taught them that God made it incumbent upon them to pray fifty times during the day and night, and that this had kept them from their work. Al-Hayṣam then sent for the man; he was seized and brought before him. Al-Hayṣam asked him about his activities, and the man told him his story; whereupon, al-Hayṣam swore to kill him. At the latter's command, the man was imprisoned in a house behind locked doors, and the key was placed under al-Hayṣam's pillow. Al-Hayṣam had been drinking when one of the maid-servants who had been in the house and heard the man's story was moved to pity for him. When al-Hayṣam fell asleep, she took the key from under his pillow, opened the door and led the man out. Then she locked the door and put the key back in its place. When al-Hayṣam awoke, he called for the key, opened the door and found that the man was not there. When news about this spread among the people of that region, [2127] they were excited and said, "He has been taken to heaven."

177. Lit. "Nabatean."

178. The 'Abbāsid propaganda also utilized twelve agents who were designated as naqībs. The model was Muḥammad, who sent twelve agents to pave the way for his journey to al-Madīnah. It is interesting that the Qarmaṭians should have traced this back to Christian sources. The 'Abbāsids relying on the Qur'ān found a prototype in the twelve leaders of the Banū Isrā'īl. A study of the term naqīb in 'Abbāsid propaganda is being readied by J. Lassner.

Later on, he appeared in another place, and met some of his friends and others. They asked him about his experience and he replied, "No one can work evil upon me and thus control me." This lifted him still higher in their eyes. Fearing for his safety, he left for the vicinity of Damascus, and nothing was heard of him. People called him by the name of the owner of the oxen in whose house he had been, Karmītah. Later they found it easier to pronounce it as Qarmaṭ.[179]

This story was reported by one of our colleagues—someone who was in the presence of Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. al-Jarrāḥ. The latter had summoned some Qarmaṭians from prison and interrogated them about Zikrawayh—this was after he had slain the latter—and about Qarmaṭ and his story. These men pointed to one of the group, an old man, and said, "This man is Zikrawayh's brother-in-law, and he knows his story best, so ask him whatever you wish." Ibn al-Jarrāḥ asked him, whereupon, the man told him this story.

According to Muḥammad b. Dāwūd: Qarmaṭ was a man from the Kūfah area, who used to cart the crops of the villages of al-Kūfah with oxen; his name was Ḥamdān, and they nicknamed him Qarmaṭ.

Subsequently, word of the Qarmaṭians and their belief spread, and their numbers increased in the Kūfah area. When al-Ṭā'ī, that is, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad, learned about them, he taxed everyone of them a dīnār a year, and in this way he collected an enormous fortune. Some Kūfans went to the authorities and brought the matter of the Qarmaṭians to their attention, saying that the latter had invented a new religion which was different from Islām, and that they thought of putting Muḥammad's people to the sword, all except those who did homage to their religion. They added that al-Ṭā'ī was concealing the Qarmaṭian cause from the authorities, that he neither paid attention nor listened to them (that is, the Kūfans). The Kūfans left, but one of them remained at Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) for a long time, making his appeal and asserting that he could not possibly return to his city for fear of al-Ṭā'ī. [2128]

179. This etymology does not seem likely. See Madelung's comments on the origins of the name Qarmaṭ in *EI*², s.v. Ḳarmaṭī.

Among the stories about these Qarmaṭians and their beliefs is the following. They had brought a book which contained this text, "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful!" Thus says al-Faraj b. 'Uthmān—he was from the village called Naṣrānah[180] which preached the religion of Christ, who is Jesus, who is the Logos, who is the Messiah (Mahdī), who is Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al Ḥanafiyyah, who is Gabriel.[181] He mentioned that Christ appeared before him in human form, and told him, "You are the preacher, and you are the proof; you are the she-camel, and you are the ass; you are the Holy Spirit, and you are John the Baptist (Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyā')." He also informed al-Faraj that the prayer consists of four prostrations, two before the sunrise and two after sunset. He added that the call to every prayer is, "Allāh is great, Allāh is great, Allāh is great, Allāh is great. I testify that there is no God but Allāh"—to be said twice—"I testify that Adam is the Messenger of God; I testify that Noah is the Messenger of God; I testify that Abraham is the Messenger of God; I testify that Moses is the Messenger of God; I testify that Jesus is the Messenger of God; I testify that Muḥammad is the Messenger of God; I testify that Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah is the Messenger of God." He further let him know that the istiftāḥ[182] is to be read with every prostration, as it was revealed to Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah; and that the orientation of prayer (qiblah) is toward Jerusalem, and that the pilgrimage is to Jerusalem.

180. I have not succeeded in identifying this place. Naṣrānah may be a play on words; the word naṣrānī means Christian.

181. This statement may be a lingering echo of the doctrine of the transmigration of souls which was popular among the proto-Shī'ite groups of the eighth century. See Watt, Islamic Thought, 53, 57, 153.

[2129] He added that Monday is the day of congregational prayers and no work is to be done on it, and that the sūrah reads:

> Praise God for His Logos. May He be exalted in His name, bestowed upon His saints through His saints. Say, "The new moons were given to the people." Their exoteric meaning allows people to calculate the years and months and days, but the esoteric meaning indicates that they are my Saints, who have taught my worshipers my path. Beware of me, O people of superior mind. I am the one who would not be called to account for his deeds. I am the knowing, I am the wise, and I am the one who will test my worshipers and try my creatures. He who bears patiently my test, trial and experience, I shall place in Paradise, and I will grant him my everlasting grace. But he who deserts my cause and speaks against my messengers will be flung into eternal pain and humiliation. I shall fulfill my purpose and reveal my cause through the tongues of my apostles. I am the one who is not surpassed by any powerful one, but I depose him; nor by any glorious one, but I render him contemptible. But I am not one of those who persist in their cause and persevere in their ignorance and say, "I shall continue to cleave to it, and believe it." For those are the unbelievers.

And when he would prostrate himself he would say, "Praise be to my Lord, the Lord of Glory, who is above all description by the wicked.'" This is to be said twice. And when he prostrated himself fully, he said, "God is most high, God is most high, God is most powerful, God is most powerful."

Among his precepts were these: that two fasts were to be observed during the year, on Mihrajān and Nawrūz;[183] that nabīdh

182. The reciting of the opening sūrah (fātiḥah) of the Qur'ān.
183. That is, the Persian festivals marking the fall and the new year.

was prohibited and wine permitted;[184] that ablution, in the sense of washing away legal impurity, was invalid and only ablution for prayer was left in force; that anyone who rose to fight against him was to be punished by death, but that those who opposed him without fighting were to have a poll-tax imposed upon them; that animals with tusks and talons were forbidden food.

The arrival of Qarmaṭ in the neighborhood of al-Kūfah took [2130] place before the leader of the Zanj was killed. That is, one of our colleagues (heard this from) Zikrawayh's brother-in law: I went to the leader of the Zanj. Arriving before him I said, "I subscribe to a certain religious practice, and have one hundred thousand swords at my command. Let us discuss this matter. If we agree about the practice, I will join you with all my men; if not, I will withdraw." I then said to him, "Grant me safe-conduct." He did this. I held a discussion with him until noon, but then it finally became clear to me that he was opposed to my ideas. When he rose to go to perform the prayer I slipped out, and, leaving his city, I went to the area of al-Kūfah.

On the twenty-fourth of Jumādā II, 278 (Sunday, October 3, 891), Aḥmad al-'Ujayfī came to the city of Ṭarsūs, together with Yāzamān; he carried out the summer expedition (against the Byzantines), reaching Salandū. During this raid Yāzamān died. The cause of his death was a fragment from a ballista stone that hit him in the ribs when he was standing at the fortress of Salandū. The army withdrew, although they were on the verge of taking it. Yāzamān expired on the road the next day, that is, Tuesday, the fourteenth of Rajab (October 23, 891). He was brought to Ṭarsūs on the shoulders of the troops and buried there.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī.

184. This reverses Muslim practices which allow the drinking of certain slightly fermented beverages (nabīdh) but prohibit wine.

The Events of the Year

[2131]

279

(April 3, 892–March 22, 893)

Among the events taking place, the authorities decreed in Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) that no popular preachers, astrologers, or fortune-tellers should sit (and practice their trade) in the streets or in the Friday Mosque. Moreover, the booksellers were sworn not to trade in books of theology, polemics or philosophy.

On the twenty-eighth of al-Muḥarram, 279 (Sunday, April 30, 892), Ja'far al-Mufawwaḍ was stripped of his right to the throne. That same day, al-Mu'taḍid was acknowledged as the heir apparent to succeed al-Mu'tamid. Letters about the deposition of Ja'far and the appointment of al-Mu'taḍid were composed and sent to the provinces, and in the Friday sermon al-Mu'taḍid was named as heir apparent. On behalf of al-Mu'taḍid, letters were written to the governors and prefects to the effect that the Commander of the Faithful had named him heir to the throne and had transferred to him all the rights which al-Muwaffaq had had, to issue orders and prohibitions and to effect appointments and dismissals.

On the fifth of Rabī' II, 279 (Wednesday, May 8, 892), Jarādah, the secretary of Abū al-Ṣaqr, was seized. Al-Muwaffaq had sent Jarādah to Rāfi b. Harthamah, and he returned to Baghdad (Madīnat al-Salām) a few days before he was seized.

On the twenty fourth of Jumādā I, 279 (Tuesday, August 22, 892), Abū Ṭalḥah Manṣūr b. Muslim left Shahrazūr—it had been assigned to him. Both he and his secretary, 'Aqāmah, were seized and placed in prison.

On Saturday, the twenty first of Jumādā I, 279 (August 19, 892), a fierce battle broke in Ṭarsūs between Muḥammad b. Mūsā and Maknūn, the page of al-Muwaffaq's mawlā, Rāghib. The reason for this is as follows. Ṭughj b. Juff came upon Rāghib in Aleppo, and told him that Khumarawayh b. Aḥmad would like to see him. Moreover, on behalf of Khumarawayh, he promised Rāghib his heart's desire. At this, the latter left Aleppo for Egypt with five of his pages, while he dispatched his eunuch Maknūn, together with his available forces, funds, and weapons to Ṭarsūs. Ṭughj, meanwhile, had written to Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-A'raj, informing him that he had sent Rāghib away, and that everything Rāghib had in the way of money, arms, and pages was in the hands of Rāghib's servant Maknūn, and that the latter was already en route to Ṭarsūs. It was therefore incumbent upon al-A'raj to seize Maknūn and his men the moment they entered the city. And, indeed, no sooner did Maknūn enter Ṭarsūs, than al-A'raj attacked him, and seized him and all he had. However, the populace of Ṭarsūs intervened and fell upon al-A'raj, seizing the former and turning him over to Maknūn for imprisonment. Having learned that there was a plot against Rāghib, the people of Ṭarsūs wrote to Khumarawayh b. Aḥmad, informing him what al-A'raj had done, and that they had taken him into custody. They proposed, "Let Rāghib go free so that he may return to us. Then we will release al-A'raj." Khumarawayh then released Rāghib and sent him to Ṭarsūs along with Aḥmad b. Ṭughān who was to serve as governor of the border regions. At the same time, he dismissed al-A'raj from this post. When Rāghib reached Ṭarsūs, Muḥammad b. Mūsā al-A'raj was released, and Aḥmad b. Ṭughān entered Ṭarsūs, as governor of the city and the border regions, accompanied by Rāghib. They entered Ṭarsūs on Tuesday, the thirteenth of Sha'bān (November 7, 892). [2132]

[2133] On Monday, the nineteenth of Rajab (October 14, 892), al-Mu'tamid passed away. He had spent Sunday drinking to excess on the river bank in the Ḥasanī Palace.[185] Then he had supper and overate. During the night he died. His reign, reportedly, lasted twenty-three years and six days.

185. For the Ḥasanī Palace in Baghdad, see Lassner, Topography, index, 321.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXXVIII

The Return of the Caliphate to Baghdad

TRANSLATED BY FRANZ ROSENTHAL

The Caliphate of al-Muʿtaḍid

In the morning following this night [Monday, Rajab 19, 279 (Monday, October 16, 892, to Tuesday, October 17)], the oath of allegiance as caliph was given to Abū al-ʿAbbās al-Muʿtaḍid bi-llāh. Al-Muʿtaḍid then appointed his page Badr as chief of police,[1] ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān b. Wahb as wazīr,[2] and Muḥammad b. al-Shāh b. Mīkāl as chief of the guard.[3] He also appointed Ṣāliḥ, who was known as (Ṣāliḥ) al-Amīn, as chief chamberlain (ḥājib) for both the inner circle of notables (khāṣṣah) and the commoners (ʿāmmah).[4] Ṣāliḥ took the place of Khafīf al-Samarqandī.[5]

---

[1] Upon his elevation to the caliphate, the new Caliph immediately filled the positions most important for the safe assumption of his duties with old friends. This was rarely, if ever, done on the spur of the moment. In one of the versions of al-Muʿtaḍid's dream reported sub anno 282 (see below, n. 137), we are told that the dream made him so confident of becoming caliph soon that he drew up a list of his first appointees. Only the names of Badr and ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān are mentioned there. Badr was listed as the future chamberlain, the more prestigious office, but, as it turned out, the new caliph felt that he needed a man with military experience whom he trusted completely in the office of Chief of Security. See also text above, III, 2122f. However, Badr remained at the top of the list, regardless of the normal ranking of his office. On Badr, who was killed shortly after al-Muʿtaḍid's death, see text below, 2209ff., and EI² Suppl., s. v. Badr.

[2] On ʿUbaydallāh [d. 288 (April 903)], see Sourdel, Vizirat, 326-45.

[3] There seems to be no further mention of him. His father, however, was an important officer, first mentioned in the text above, III, 1532.

[4] The meanings of khāṣṣah and ʿāmmah are briefly discussed in Mottahedeh, Loyalty, 115. There seems to be no information on Ṣāliḥ al-Amīn beyond what is mentioned here.

[5] He may be identical with the Khafīf mentioned above. See text, III, 1953. He was close to al-Muʿtaḍid and appears occasionally as an informant on events during his reign. See, for instance, Tanūkhī, Nishwār, III, 260; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 134f.; Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿah, ʿUyūn, I, 231. On his relations with the two Ibn al-Furāts, see Ṣābi', Wuzarā', index.

On Shaʿbān 2, 279 (October 28, 892), the emissary of ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār[6] came to al-Muʿtaḍid bearing gifts[7] and requested that ʿAmr be appointed governor of Khurāsān. Al-Muʿtaḍid sent ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī[8] back with the emissary, carrying robes of honor and a standard for ʿAmr signifying his (new) rank as governor of Khurāsān. They reached ʿAmr in Ramaḍān 279 (November 25-December 24, 892). The robes of honor were bestowed upon him, and the standard was exhibited in the courtyard of his house for three days.

In this year, the report of the death of Naṣr b. Aḥmad reached Baghdad. Naṣr's brother, Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad, took charge of his administrative functions in Transoxania.[9]

On Tuesday, Shawwāl 3, 279 (Wednesday, December 27, 892), al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh, who was known as Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ,[10] arrived from Egypt as the emissary of Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn.[11] He brought gifts among which were:

Twenty loads of gold specie on mules

Ten eunuchs

Two boxes containing textiles with ornamental borders (ṭirāz)[12]

---

[6] For the Ṣaffārids, see the brief entry in Bosworth, Islamic Dynasties, 103-6.

[7] The gifts offered on this occasion are listed in Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhāʾir, 41. Further gifts from ʿAmr to al-Muʿtaḍid in the years 280, 281, 283, and 286 are listed in Dhakhāʾir, 39-45.

[8] One of the most important figures of his time, ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī died as governor of Egypt in the spring of 297 (910). See ʿArīb, 33f.; Ibn al-Athīr, sub anno 297; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 145ff. The origin of his nisbah, meaning "New Town" in Persian, appears undetermined; Samʿānī, Ansāb, has no further information on its likely origin.

[9] The Sāmānid brothers Naṣr and Ismāʿīl ruled, respectively, from 864 to 892 and from 892 to 907.

[10] See *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Djaṣṣāṣ. His career as a selfmade, enormously wealthy jeweler and wit with powerful connections fascinated his contemporaries so that he is much discussed by historians and littérateurs.

[11] See *EI*², s. v. Khumārawayh.

[12] One of the glories of Muslim craftsmanship, usually produced in government factories. R has ṭarāʾif "curios," and Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 138, l. 13, found the same reading in the manuscript he used. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 117f., ed. Pellat, V, 139, does not have a detailed list of gifts but refers to ṭirāz. Both readings are possible, but ṭirāz seems slightly preferable. Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhāʾir, 41, speaks of "two boxes filled with fine material (diqq)."

Twenty / / men upon twenty noble camels, with saddles richly ornamented with silver, carrying silver lances and wearing brocade gowns and ornamented belts [III,2134]
Seventeen horses with saddles and bridles, five decorated with gold, and the rest with silver
Thirty-seven horses with saddle cloths ornamented with borders of different colors[13]
Five mules with saddles and bridles
A giraffe[14]

Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ went to al-Muʿtaḍid who bestowed robes of honor upon him and upon seven individuals with him. The purpose of his trip was to arrange a marriage between the daughter of Khumārawayh and al-Muʿtaḍid's son ʿAlī.[15] However, al-Muʿtaḍid said that he himself would marry her, and so he did.[16]

In this year, word reached Baghdad that Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh[17] had seized the fortress of Mārdīn from Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundāj.[18]

---

[13] See Ṭabari, Introductio etc., CCCXVIII; Busse, "Hofbudget," 24, n. 104.

[14] The list appears in Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 41, in substantially the same form, with slight differences mainly in the wording. The fourth item appears as "twenty ornamented donkeys," and the giraffe is omitted, probably merely by oversight; giraffes were not uncommon in gifts from Africa. It would be difficult to assume that Ibn al-Zubayr used Ṭabarī and changed the wording arbitrarily. Ibn al-Zubayr has many other detailed reports on gifts not found in Ṭabarī. It is also unlikely that Ibn al-Zubayr used an intermediary that somehow depended on Ṭabarī. In all likelihood both Ṭabarī and Ibn al-Zubayr (or his source) depended upon a common source, possibly an original document, and Ṭabarī may have preserved the more accurate text. Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 138, quotes Ṭabarī.

[15] It can be assumed that Khumārawayh's daughter Qaṭr al-Nadā "Dewdrop" was very young when the match with the prince, the future Caliph al-Muktafī, was proposed. ʿAlī was only about fifteen years old then, and, since her father was born in 250 (864), she cannot have been older and was probably somewhat younger. She died on Rajab 7 (9), 287 [July 8 (10), 900], see text below, 2195; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 26; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 250.

[16] The way in which al-Muʿtaḍid handled the dynastic marriage struck historians as noteworthy and, probably, as a bit peculiar. It was rarely left unreported. See also Tanūkhī, Nishwār, II, 315; Glagow, 63-67. For the brideprice paid by al-Muʿtaḍid to Khumārawayh, see Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 118f.; ed. Pellat, V, 139.

[17] See EI², s. v. ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh. He died in 285 (898), see text below, 2185. The name of his father al-Shaykh was ʿAbd al-Razzāq.

[18] Or Ibn Kundājīq, d. 304 (916-17). See ʿArīb, 63f.; Eclipse, I, 33 (n. 1). For his father, see text above, III, 1877, 2112.

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. al-Mudabbir[19] died on Wednesday, Shawwāl 16 or 17, 279 (Tuesday or Wednesday, January 9 or 10, 893). He had been in charge of the Office of Estates.[20] Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd[21] was appointed in his place.

In this year, Rāshid, the mawlā of al-Muwaffaq,[22] was confirmed as governor of al-Dīnawar. Robes of honor were bestowed upon him on Saturday, Shawwāl 20,[23] 279 (Saturday, January 13, 893). Then, on Thursday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 10, 279 (Thursday, February 1, 893), Rāshid left to assume his administrative duties.

On the Day of Slaughtering (Dhū al-Ḥijjah 10), 279 (March 3, 893),[24] al-Muʿtaḍid, accompanied by the officers and troops, rode to the oratory he had chosen for himself near the Ḥasanī Palace[25] in order to lead the public prayer. He reportedly said "God is Great (Allāhu Akbar)" six times during the first rakʿah, and once [2135] during the second.[26] // He then ascended the pulpit, but his sermon was inaudible. The Old Oratory was left vacant and was no longer used for prayer.[27]

In this year, a dispatch was sent to Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf, [28] ordering him into combat against Rāfiʿ b. Harthamah,[29]

---

[19] See text above, III, 1384; EI[2], s. v. Ibn al-Mudabbir.

[20] The dīwān al-ḍiyāʿ was the government department charged with the administration of the caliphal landholdings.

[21] D. 287 (900), see text below, 2192. See also n. 423.

[22] D. 280 (893), see text below, 2139. See also text above, III, 1988; Busse, "Hofbudget," 18, n. 60.

[23] According to the edition, the date was Shawwāl 22, which was a Monday. Thus "seven" must be corrected to "nine," i. e. Shawwāl 20.

[24] R had merely Dhū al-Ḥijjah, but it is clear that the ʿīd al-aḍḥā festival is meant. According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 117, ed. Pellat, V, 139, the incident occurred on the day of the breaking of the fast, that is, the day of the minor ʿīd, Monday, Shawwāl 1, 279 (Monday, December 25, 892). The correct indication of the day of the week may favor this earlier date.

[25] See Lassner, Topography, 84f., 97, 265f.

[26] The number and sequence of takbīrāt during the prayer on the festival could hold political significance, as is indicated above, II, 1955f. This may also be the case here.

[27] The active is not excluded: "no longer used by the Caliph." If the Old Oratory was no longer used, it nevertheless remained a landmark on the East Side of Baghdad, see text below, 2244.

[28] Aḥmad died the following year. See text below, 2137; also above, III, 1929; Canard, Ḥamdanides, 311ff.; Zambaur, 199.

[29] Rāfiʿ was killed in 283, See text below, 2160; also above, III, 2039.

who was in al-Rayy. Aḥmad advanced against him, and they met in battle on Thursday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 23, 279 (Wednesday, February 14, 893). Rāfiʿ was routed and left al-Rayy, whereupon Ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz entered the city.[30]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Hārūn b. Muḥammad al-Hāshimī.[31] It was his last pilgrimage. He had led the pilgrimage sixteen times, from 264 (878) to this year.

[30] See Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 139f., ed. Pellat, V, 147f.

[31] Hārūn b. Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Mūsā [who led the pilgrimage in 182 (799)] b. ʿĪsā [d. 167 (783-84)] b. Mūsā b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī was a great-great-grandson of ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, the nephew of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr. According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, IX, 74, ed. Pellat, V, 299, Hārūn led the pilgrimage fifteen consecutive times, the last time in 278; in 279, Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā led the pilgrimage for the first of nine times ending in 287. Masʿūdī appears to be in error. For Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh, see below, n. 357. Note that Ṭabarī does not report the leader of the pilgrimage for 281, 282, and 283; he lists Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh for the years 284-87. Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 147, l. 20, and 151, l. 13, lists Muḥammad b. Hārūn (see below, n. 71) as the leader of the pilgrimage in 281 and 282 but, like Ṭabarī, gives no name for 283.

The Events of the Year 280

(MARCH 23, 893 - MARCH 12, 894)

One of the events was al-Muʿtaḍid's seizure of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muhtadī[32] and Muḥammad b. al-Ḥasan b. Sahl, who was known as Shaylamah.[33] This Shaylamah had stayed with the master of the Zanj[34] until his last days. He then joined al-Muwaffaq under a guarantee of safe-conduct and subsequently received his protection. Al-Muʿtaḍid seized the two men because Shaylamah was denounced to him by one of those who had obtained a guarantee of safe-conduct. The informer told the Caliph that Shaylamah was propagandizing for a person of unknown name and that he had already sought to corrupt a number of military men and others. A pharmacist and a nephew of Shaylamah from al-Madīnah were seized with him. Al-Muʿtaḍid tried to make Shaylamah confess, but he admitted [2136] nothing. When asked by al-Muʿtaḍid // about the man for whom he was propagandizing, he again admitted nothing but said, "If he were underneath my feet, I would not lift them, and if you were to make minced meat[35] out of me, I would not tell

---

[32] The name of the ʿAbbāsid prince is also transmitted as ʿUbaydallāh, but nothing further, it seems, is known about him. An Abū al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Muhtadī appears in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 194, 348. See also below, n. 39.

[33] Masʿūdī states expressly that he was a nephew of the great wazīr al-Faḍl b. Sahl [d. 202 (818)]. Al-Faḍl's brother al-Ḥasan b. Sahl died in the early summer of 235 (850). For Shaylamah at al-Muwaffaq's court, see Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī, Baṣā'ir, ed. I. al-Kaylānī, III,2, 505 (Damascus, n. d.). No information is available on the pharmacist and Shaylamah's nephew.

[34] The leader of the Zanj revolt, which lasted fourteen years, did not survive his defeat in August 883. See text above, III, 2098. According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 140, ed. Pellat, V, 148; Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 127, Shaylamah wrote a biography of the Zanj leader.

[35] R: kardanāj, the expected spelling with final j. Steingass, Persian-English Dictionary, explains gardanā, gardanāj as meat boiled and roasted (with spices). The translation "minced meat" was chosen for its idiomatic flavor.

you about him." At this, al-Muʿtaḍid gave orders to make a fire. Shaylamah was tied upon a wooden tent plank and rotated over the fire till his skin peeled. He was then decapitated, and his corpse was hung at the Lower Bridge on the West Side.[36] Ibn al-Muḥtadī was detained until his innocence was ascertained, whereupon he was released. The hanging of Shaylamah took place on al-Muḥarram 9,[37] 280 (March 31, 893).

Al-Muʿtaḍid reportedly said to Shaylamah, "I have heard that you are propagandizing for Ibn al-Muhtadī." Shaylamah replied, "The real story is different. I am friendly to the cause of the family of the son of Abū Ṭālib."[38] Al-Muʿtaḍid had tried to make his nephew confess, and he did. When he told Shaylamah that his nephew had confessed, he replied, "He is a mere lad who said what he did because he is afraid of being killed. His statement is unacceptable." After a long time, his nephew and the pharmacist were released.[39]

On Sunday, Ṣafar 1, 280 (Sunday, April 22, 893), al-Muʿtaḍid marched from Baghdad against the Banū Shaybān. He encamped at the Garden (Bustān) of Bishr b. Hārūn,[40] and then left on Wednesday, having appointed his chamberlain (ḥājib) Ṣāliḥ al-Amīn to take his place in the caliphal palace and in the city.

---

[36] See Lassner, Topography, 280.

[37] Text: "seven," but both R and B seem to have "nine." The reading of C remains to be checked.

[38] Apparently, any descendant of Abū Ṭālib through his most famous son, ʿAlī, could be meant.

[39] Ṭabarī combines two reports which most likely came to him from different sources. Other reports, not depending on Ṭabarī, appear in Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 140-42, ed. Pellat, V, 148f., and Tanūkhī, Nishwār, I, 144ff. See also Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 127.

Tanūkhī speaks of an unnamed descendant of al-Wāthiq (the father of al-Muhtadī) who aspired to the caliphate and made Shaylamah his wazīr. In Shaylamah's house, lists of names of the co-conspirators were discovered, and the prince fled. Shaylamah's denial that an ʿAbbāsid prince was involved, and his insistence that it was an ʿAlid, may have been a coverup for a dynastic intrigue. In view of Shaylamah's antecedents this may seem unlikely, but we should be aware that contemporaries, like modern scholars, were always inclined to suspect sectarian motives.

[40] The precise location of the Garden of Bishr b. Hārūn is not known. It was evidently a large park suitable as a staging area for military expeditions. It is not impossible that Bishr b. Hārūn was the brother of Jābir and Ibrāhīm, mentioned as Christian secretaries of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir; see text above, III, 1511, 1524.

Al-Muʿtaḍid marched toward the place in the Jazīrah that the Shaybān had chosen as a stronghold. When they heard that he was marching against them, they gathered their possessions and families in one place. A letter from al-Muʿtaḍid then reached Baghdad stating that he had marched at night from al-Sinn[41] to engage the Arab tribesmen and that he had attacked them. He had killed a great number of them, and a good many[42] of them [2137] had drowned in the two Zābs. He had seized // women and children, and the soldiers had gained more booty than they could carry. Moreover, so many small cattle and camels of the Shaybān had fallen into their hands that a sheep sold for (only) a dirham and a camel for five dirhams.

Al-Muʿtaḍid ordered their women and children guarded until they could be sent down to Baghdad. He then went to Mosul and from there to Balad,[43] before he returned to Baghdad. The Shaybān came to meet him and asked his pardon, and they gave him numerous hostages. He reportedly accepted five hundred of their men.

When al-Muʿtaḍid was on his way back to Madīnat al-Salām,[44] Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh[45] joined him, bringing along the amount of money which he had received for the release of Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh—money which the latter had taken from Isḥāq b. Kundāj. He also brought presents, horses, and mules. This was on Wednesday, Rabīʿ II 7,[46] 280 (Wednesday, June 26, 893).

---

[41] At the confluence of the Lesser Zāb and the Tigris. Ibn al-Athīr has "at," instead of "from." Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 142f., ed. Pellat, V, 149, locates the battle at Wādī al-Dhi'āb, for which see text below, 2293.

[42] R omits kathīr.

[43] North of Mosul on the Tigris.

[44] By this time, Madīnat al-Salām was fully synonymous with Baghdad, but the expression has been retained here wherever it occurs.

[45] See text above, III, 1927. Ibn Abī al-Aṣbagh was in charge of the Office of Taxation. According to Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 50, 87, 152, he was Abū al-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh. His identification with Abū ʿAbdallāh Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Badr b. al-Aṣbagh, assumed by the editor of Tanūkhī, Nishwār, VIII, 116 (see the translation of Margoliouth, Table-Talk, 54), appears to be unfounded. Badr b. al-Aṣbagh is mentioned in the text above, III, 1137, sub anno 250 (864), as the chief tax official in al-Kūfah. For Isḥāq b. Kundāj, see above, n. 18.

[46] On the page following.

In Rabīʿ I (May 21-June 19, 893),[47] word reached Baghdad that Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj[48] had conquered al-Marāghah after a difficult siege and a fierce battle between himself and the inhabitants of the city. He had granted safe-conduct to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥusayn al-Hamadhānī[49] and his men but then seized him. He put him in fetters and imprisoned him. He made him confess where all his property was, then killed him. He was buried in Zanjān.

In Rabīʿ II, 280 (June 20-July 18,893),[50] word concerning the death of Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf reached Baghdad. His death had occurred at the end of Rabīʿ I. The troops now demanded their allotments and looted the residence of Ismāʿīl b. Muḥammad al-Munshi'.[51] Two (other) sons of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, ʿUmar and Bakr,[52] competed for the position of leadership. ʿUmar took control of the administration, although al-Muʿtaḍid had not sent him a letter of appointment as governor.// [2138]

---

[46] Here, and in the following two items, there seems to be some confusion as to whether it was Rabīʿ I or Rabīʿ II. The confusion probably goes back to Ṭabarī himself. Rabīʿ I 7 (as in Ṭabarī) fell upon a Monday and is thus ruled out. R, however, reads Rabīʿ I 9 (May 29), which was indeed a Wednesday (as was Rabīʿ II 7). Since the date appears to refer to the time when al-Muʿtaḍid was on his way back to Baghdad (which Ṭabarī reports as having taken place in Rabīʿ II), the later date seems preferable. The expedition presumably lasted longer than just one month. If the reference to Rabīʿ I in the following item (see below, n. 47) is correct, it merely means that the author resumed the chronological sequence after reporting events connected with al-Muʿtaḍid's campaign.

[47] RB: Rabīʿ II.

[48] See text above, III, 1937. His surname was Afshīn. He died in 288 (901), as reported below, 2202f. For his brother Yūsuf, see below, n. 57; for his son Dēwdād, see below, n. 471.

[49] He is also mentioned by Masʿūdī in connection with this episode, but there seems to be no more information on him. R: al-Hamdānī.

[50] RBC: Rabīʿ I. Although this was no doubt found in the original, the later reference to the end of Rabīʿ I shows it to be wrong.

[51] Al-Munshi' may indicate that he was a draftsman of documents, but information on him appears to be lacking.

[52] The rivalry of ʿUmar and Bakr and the role of their brothers is the subject of attention in the following pages. On their celebrated grandfather Abū Dulaf, see Sezgin, GAS, II, 632. On Bakr [d. 285 (898)] in his capacity as poet, see Sezgin, GAS, II, 633. I have no information on the date of ʿUmar's death. On Abū Dulaf and the family, see also *EI*², s. v. al-Ḳāsim b. ʿĪsā.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Thawr[53] conquered ʿUmān and sent the heads of a number of its inhabitants to Baghdad.

Jaʿfar b. al-Muʿtamid[54] reportedly died on Sunday, Rabīʿ II 12, 280 (Sunday, July 1, 893). He had resided in the palace of al-Muʿtaḍid and had not left it or made any public appearances; on occasion, al-Muʿtaḍid used to invite him as a boon companion.[55]

In this (month),[56] al-Muʿtaḍid returned to Baghdad from his expedition against the Arab tribesmen.

In Jumādā II, 280 (August 18-September 15, 893), word reached Baghdad that ʿAmr b. al-Layth had entered Naysābūr in Jumādā I.

In this year, Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj[57] sent thirty-two Khārijites[58] from the Mosul Road to Baghdad. Twenty-five of them were decapitated and their corpses hung. Seven[59] were imprisoned in the New Prison.[60] [53] Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 143, ed. Pellat, V, 149, has Aḥmad, apparently corrected in Pellat's edition to Muḥammad on the basis of Ṭabarī. Masʿūdī tells us that he marched from al-Baḥrayn against the Ibāḍī Khārijites whose Imām, al-Ṣalt b. Mālik, resided in Nazwā. However, T. Lewicki, in *EI*², s.v. al-Ibāḍiyya (III, 652a), states that al-Ṣalt ruled until 273 (887); if this is correct, Masʿūdī's information on the Ibāḍī leadership in ʿUmān was out of date. No futher information on Ibn Thawr seems available.

---

[54] Al-Muʿtaḍid's cousin, Abū al-ʿAbbās Jaʿfar was appointed first successor, before al-Muʿtaḍid, and received the surname al-Mufawwiḍ (scil. amrahū rather than al-Mufawwaḍ amruhū) ilā Allāh in 278. He was deposed from this position on al-Muḥarram 22, 279 (April 24, 892), see text above, III, 2123, 2131.

[55] Of the known regular boon companions of al-Muʿtaḍid, only Ibn Ḥamdūn was mentioned by Ṭabarī (see below, n. 233). The historian had, of course, no particular interest in these aspects of al-Muʿtaḍid's life. He also tells us nothing about the Caliph's literary and scholarly interests. The reference here was intended to show al-Muʿtaḍid in a good light.

[56] The feminine pronoun refers here to the name of the month, and not to the year.

[57] See text above, III, 2107. He is repeatedly mentioned in ʿArīb, Hamadhānī, and Miskawayh (Eclipse, I 172ff.) down to the year 315 (927) in which he was killed.

[58] They may have been followers of the Khārijite Hārūn, mentioned sub annis 281 and 283.

[59] R and Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 142, l. 20: "the rest of them."

[60] See Lassner, Topography, 70.

On Rajab 5, 280 (September 20, 893), Muḥammad b. Abbā[61] entered Ṭarsūs for the summer campaign on behalf of Khumārawayh. He was followed there by Badr al-Ḥammāmī,[62] and together with al-ʿUjayfī, the amīr of Ṭarsūs,[63] they raided as far as al-Balaqsūn.[64]

In this year, word reached Baghdad that Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad had raided the land of the Turks and reportedly conquered their capital.[65] He had captured their king and his wife Khātūn[66] as well as about ten thousand people, many of whom he killed. The booty included an uncounted number of horses. Upon division of the booty, every Muslim horseman received a thousand dirhams.[67] / / [2139]

On Ramaḍān 28, 280 (December 11, 893), Rāshid, the mawlā of al-Muwaffaq, died in al-Dīnawar. He was carried in a casket to Baghdad. He had repented and recanted.

On Shawwāl 13, 280 (December 26, 893), Masrūr al-Balkhī[68] died.

---

[61] Text: Aḥmad; R: Muḥammad. R thus makes the identification with Abū Jaʿfar Muḥammad b. Abbā virtually certain. Muḥammad b. Abbā enjoyed his greatest prominence during the reign of Hārūn b. Khumārawayh. See Kindī, Wulāh, 251; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 99, 101 ff., 139. Canard, Sources arabes, 11, in his translation of the Ṭabarī passage, has "Muḥammad" without explanation, but see Sources arabes, 265, and Canard, in Vasiliev, II, 123.

[62] The powerful Egyptian general who is often mentioned in the following pages and who died in 311 (923).

[63] For Aḥmad b. Ṭughān al-ʿUjayfī, the military commander in Ṭarsūs, see text above, III, 2130, and below, n. 172.

[64] Final n also appears in R. The apparatus of the Leiden edition also notes final n and suggests an identification with Telmissos, for which see Pauly-Wissowa, s. v. Telmessos, and, for more recent efforts to identify the Carian and Lycian Telmessos, Der Kleine Pauly, V, 375f. Canard, Sources arabes, 11, appears to accept this identification. It is, however, extremely difficult to reconcile the Arabic consonants with Telmessos/n, and Ṭabarī does not give the slightest hint where the place might be located.

[65] The capital of the Kharluq/Khaluq/Khallukh Turks, raided by the Sāmānid Ismāʿīl, was Ṭalas (Ṭarāz). See *EI*², s. v. Ḳarluḳ. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 144f., ed. Pellat, V, 150, has some more details on the episode.

[66] Khātūn was a title, not a proper name.

[67] Miskawayh: "a thousand dīnārs, or rather a thousand dirhams," see Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCVII. Although "dīnārs" is patently preposterous, the reading was no doubt found originally in Ṭabarī.

[68] Masrūr al-Balkhī was one of the Turks who helped to make al-Muʿtamid caliph. See text above, III, 1820, etc.

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 280 (February 11-March 12, 894), a letter reportedly reached Baghdad from Dabīl[69] with the information that a lunar eclipse had occurred on Shawwāl 14, 280 (December 27, 893). At the end of the night the moon had reappeared, but when the populace arose in the morning, it was dark, and the darkness continued. In the afternoon a heavy black wind began to blow. It lasted into the first third of the night. When that time had passed, there was an earthquake. In the morning the city had disappeared. Only a few of the houses had been spared—about a hundred. Up to the time the letter was written, the people of Dabīl had buried thirty thousand dead recovered from the ruins. Following the destruction, they suffered five (additional) earthquakes.[70] As reported by some(one) of them, the dead recovered from the ruins totaled one hundred and fifty thousand.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Hārūn, who was known as Ibn Turunjah.[71]

---

[69] For Dvin (Dabīl), the capital of Armenia, see *EI*², s. v. Dwin.

[70] That is, aftershocks.

[71] That is, Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. Hārūn b. al-ʿAbbās b. ʿĪsā b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, a great-great-grandson of the second ʿAbbāsid caliph. He was the imām and preacher of the Great Mosque in the city of al-Manṣūr for fifty years. He died at the age of seventy-five in 308 (920-21). See Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, III, 356. The nickname Ibn Turunjah, referring to a citrus fruit (?) (also Utrujjah, see below, n. 357), is not mentioned in Taʾrīkh Baghdād. For Utrunjah as a female proper name, see text above, III, 1300.

The Events of the Year 281

(MARCH 13, 894 - MARCH 1, 895)

One of the events was the arrival in Madīnat al-Salām of Turk[72] b. al-ʿAbbās, the governor representing the central authorities in Diyār Muḍar. Ibn al-ʿAbbās arrived on al-Muḥarram 9,[73] 281 (March 21, 894). He brought some // forty of the men of Abū [2140] al-Agharr,[74] the master of Sumaysāṭ, on camels. They wore hoods and silken cloaks.[75] The men were brought to al-Muʿtaḍid's palace. They were then remanded to the New Prison where they were incarcerated. Turk was given a robe of honor, and he then returned to his residence.

In this year, word reached Baghdad that a battle had taken place between Waṣīf,[76] the eunuch of Ibn Abī al-Sāj, and ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf, and that ʿUmar had been routed. Waṣīf then returned to his master Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj in Rabīʿ II, 281 (June 10-July 8, 894).

---

[72] R: "Zīrak," in both cases. Since there is no more information on this individual, his actual name remains doubtful. It is unlikely that the reading Zīrak resulted from a confusion with Zīrak al-Turkī, d. 269; see below, n. 171.

[73] R: "seven."

[74] Abū al-Agharr Khalīfah b. al-Mubārak (b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā; see text below, 2191) al-Sulamī died on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 7, 303 (June 12, 916). See ʿArīb, 59. The essential information on him is contained in the following pages of Ṭabarī.

[75] The costume, mentioned frequently in connection with captured rebels, mainly heretics, who were displayed in triumph, appears to have the significance of branding them as effeminate and, in particular, as dressed in a manner not proper for Muslims. It seemed important for Ibn al-Muʿtazz to mention in his poem (verse 190) in connection with the Khārijite Hārūn. According to Ibn al-Athīr, sub anno, Hārūn objected to wearing brocade because it was illegal, and he had to be forced to wear it.

[76] See text above, III, 2117f. His death in 288 (901) is reported below, 2205.

[77] Ṭughj, the father of Muḥammad, the founder of the Ikhshīdid dynasty, died in prison in Baghdad in 294 (906-7). On his brothers, who were military men like him, see nn. 155 and 742. This important contemporary leader appears first in Ṭabarī, text above, III, 2132. See also Bacharach, "The career of... al-Ikhshīd"; Kāshif, Ikhshīdiyyūn, 57-61.

On Thursday, Jumādā II 15, 281 (Thursday, August 22, 894), Ṭughj b. Juff[77] reportedly entered Ṭarsūs for the summer campaign on behalf of Khumārawayh. On this campaign, he reached Ṭarāyūn and conquered Malūriyah.[78]

On Jumādā (II) 24, 281 (August 31, 894), Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭā'ī[79] died in al-Kūfah and was buried there in a place called Masjid al-Sahlah.[80]

In this year, the springs and brooks in al-Rayy and Ṭabaristān dried up. Afterwards, people were afflicted by a terrible famine, so that people ate each other and someone would even eat his own daughter.[81]

On Rajab 2, 281 (September 7, 894), al-Muʿtaḍid left for al-Jabal[82] and marched toward the district (nāḥiyah) of al-Dīnawar. He put Abū Muḥammad ʿAlī b. al-Muʿtaḍid in charge of al-Rayy, Qazwīn, Zanjān, Abhar, Qumm, Hamadhān, and al-Dīnawar.[83] Aḥmad b. Abī al-Aṣbagh was entrusted with ʿAlī's

---

[78] The identification of Ṭarāyūn with Tyriaeon in Pisidia (see Pauly-Wissowa, s. v. Tyraion; Naour, Tyriaion) seems acceptable. See Canard, Sources arabes, 11. Among later distortions of the name, the reading Ṭarābzūn (Ibn al-Athīr; al-ʿAynī, ʿIqd al-jumān, as quoted in a footnote of the edition of Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 86) apparently came about through an absurd identification with Trebizond/Trabzon on the Black Sea.

The vocalization Malūriyah is uncertain. The name also occurs in Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 146, ed. Pellat, V, 151. Canard, Sources arabes, 11, 42, was unable to suggest an identification. It could be the same place as Mlqwbyh mentioned in the text above, III, 709, l. 11, that is, Greek Malakopea; see Honigmann, Ostgrenze, 47. An easy and natural identification, however, would seem to be Balboura near Tyriaeon. See Naour, map on p. 6.

[79] See text above, III, 2127; Halm, Kosmologie, 1. See also Guest, Ibn er Rūmī, 28; Busse, "Hofbudget," 14f.

[80] Massignon, "Plan de Kufa," 353, refers to this mosque with reference to Ṭabarī and places it on his map (fig. 1) at the site of Masjid ʿAbd al-Qays; reprinted in Massignon, Opera Minora, III, 52. See also EI[2], s. v. al-Kūfa (V, 348b).

[81] This addition in R also appears in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 147. Ibn al-Athīr, sub anno, does not have it, but his entry for the year 280 adds: "Eventually three liters (raṭl) of water cost a dirham, and prices rose greatly." Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 86, includes both additions in his narrative.

[82] That is, Northern Iraq, with the alternative form al-Jibāl. See Le Strange, Lands, 185-231.

[83] When al-Muktafī, who was at the time seventeen years old, returned to Baghdad four years later, his father expressed great satisfaction with his accomplishments in al-Rayy: "You left a son and returned a colleague." See Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 3.

secretariat, and al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr al-Naṣrānī[84] // was put in charge of his military expenditures and the estates of al-Rayy. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf was given charge of Iṣbahān, Nahāwand, and al-Karaj. Returning hurriedly because of high prices and lack of provisions, the Caliph reached Baghdad on Wednesday, Ramaḍān 3, 281 (Wednesday, November 6, 894). [2141]

In this year, al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī Kūrah,[85] Rāfiʿ's agent in al-Rayy, asked ʿAlī b. al-Muʿtaḍid for a guarantee of safe-conduct together with a thousand men. ʿAlī sent him to his father al-Muʿtaḍid.

In Dhū al-Qaʿdah (January 2-February 1, 895), the Arab tribesmen entered Sāmarrā, took Ibn Sīmā Unuf[86] captive, and looted the city.

On Dhū al-Qaʿdah 24, 281 (January 25, 895), al-Muʿtaḍid left for Mosul for the second time in order to pursue Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn.[87] He did this because word reached him that Ḥamdān was leaning toward Hārūn al-Shārī al-Wāziqī[88] and was propa-

---

[84] He is not heard from after his exile to Wāsiṭ in 290 (903). See text below, 2230.

[85] Ibn al-Athīr, sub anno 282, in relating al-Ḥasan's appointment as successor to Buktamir (see text below, n. 121), referred to him as al-Khurāsānī. Nothing significant seems to be known about him after Ṭabarī.

[86] The vocalization Unuf is conjectural. He may quite possibly be a son of Sīmā al-Sharābī (see text above, III, 1550). Since he presumably disappeared in connection with the reported incident, he could not be identical with the later-mentioned al-Qāsim b. Sīmā. The slave name Sīmā "Silver" is, of course, common.

[87] Ḥamdān, after whom the Ḥamdānid dynasty came to be named, was the father of Abū al-Hayjāʾ, who was in turn the father of Nāṣir al-Dawlah and Sayf al-Dawlah. For the first report on his connection with the Khārijite Hārūn in the year 272 (885-6), see text above, III, 2108f. See also Canard, Ḥamdānides, 298ff.

[88] See Ibn al-Muʿtazz, verses 185-97. Hārūn al-Shārī survived his surrender in 283 (see text below, 2150f.; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 168f., ed. Pellat, V, 157f.) and died in prison in 304 (916-7) (see Eclipse, I, 40, referred to by Massignon, *Passion*², I, 472; Ṣābiʾ, Wuzarāʾ, 35). A treatise by Dāwūd b. ʿAlī, the founder of the Ẓāhirite school, who died earlier in 270 (884), is assumed to deal with this Hārūn al-Shārī. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 217, l. 16.

The term shārī is well known as a preferred self-designation of the Khārijites based on Qur. 2:207 and 4:74. Wāziqī may refer to a Khārijite subsect to which Hārūn belonged. If Ibn al-Athīr is correct in assigning Hārūn to the Ṣufriyyah, the term wāziqī may more precisely refer to a subsect of the latter. A Syriac fragment (referred to by the editor of the Leiden edition in a note to this passage) deals with the Khārijites in this area and is preserved in Elias Bar Shīnāyā, Chronography, text, 186, trans. 88, quoted from Baethgen, Fragmente, text, 66, trans., 132, sub anno 266. It mentions the W'zyqāyē. The Taghlib, to which the Ḥamdānids belonged, are listed there together with the Kurds as Yaʿqūbite/Wāzīqite Khārijites.

gandizing for him. The following dispatch from al-Muʿtaḍid in Karkh Juddān[89] reached the eunuch Najāḥ al-Ḥuramī[90] concerning a battle between al-Muʿtaḍid and the Arab tribesmen and Kurds that had taken place on Friday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 30, 281 (Friday, January 31, 895):

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate

This dispatch of mine is being written early on the night of Saturday. God—Praised be He!—has given us victory over the Kurds and the Arab tribesmen and enabled us to capture a large number of them and their families. You could have seen us driving away their cattle and sheep as we did last year. The spears and swords were getting at them without interruption, until the night intervened between us. Fires were lit on the mountain tops. The following morning, the operation will be wound up, and my troops will follow me to al-Karkh.[91] We attacked[92] and [2142] killed them // over a distance of fifty miles (mīl)[93], and not one of them remained to tell the tale. God be praised very much! It is now our duty to be grateful ⌜to God⌝. Praised be God, the Lord of the worlds, and may God's prayers and ample blessings be upon the Prophet Muḥammad and his family!

When the Arab tribesmen and Kurds had learned that al-Muʿtaḍid was leaving Baghdad, they had made a solemn compact with each other, swearing under oath that they all were ready to die together. They gathered and arranged troops in three [89] Also known as Karkh Sāmarrā. See Le Strange, Lands, 52, 54f.

---

[90] According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 116, ed. Pellat, V, 138, he was in charge of the dungeons and of torture. It is not evident why he should have been the recipient of the dispatch.

[91] That is, the previously mentioned Karkh Juddān/Sāmarrā.

[92] R: īqāʿunā.

[93] One mīl corresponds to 2 km. That they were pursued and slaughtered along a route that extended over a hundred kilometers seems exaggerated.

squadrons,[94] one behind the other. They placed their households and possessions at the rear of the squadron. Al-Muʿtaḍid, with a cavalry detachment, advanced ahead of his troops and attacked the Arab tribesmen and Kurds, killing some of them. A large number of them drowned[95] in the Zāb.

Al-Muʿtaḍid then left for Mosul, marching toward the fortress of Mārdīn which was in the hands of Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn. When word reached Ḥamdān of al-Muʿtaḍid's approach, he fled, leaving his son[96] behind. The troops of al-Muʿtaḍid stationed themselves opposite the fortress. Those within it fought them all that day. The next morning, al-Muʿtaḍid mounted and went up to the fortress. When he reached the gate, he called out, "O Ibn Ḥamdūn,"[97] and (someone) replied, "At your service!" Al-Muʿtaḍid told him, "Woe unto you! Open the gate!," and he did. Al-Muʿtaḍid now seated himself in the gate and ordered people to go in and bring out all the property and furniture that was in the fortress. He then ordered the fortress destroyed, and this was done. Following this, he sought Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn, and the most strenuous search was undertaken. Property that was on deposit with him was seized, and all of it was brought to al-Muʿtaḍid. Ḥamdān was captured later.[98]

Al-Muʿtaḍid then went to a city called al-Ḥasaniyyah.[99] A man called Shaddād[100] was there with a substantial army, reportedly ten // thousand men. He had a stronghold in the [2143] city. Al-Muʿtaḍid defeated him, then seized him and had his stronghold destroyed.

In this year, word was received from the Mecca Road that a severe cold, torrential rains, and hail had been encountered by [94] On the difference between fighting in rows (ṣaff) and in squadrons (kurdūs), see text above, III, 312.

---

[95] R: "was caused by him to drown."

[96] Apparently, al-Ḥusayn, about whom much is said in the following pages.

[97] "O Ibn Ḥamdūn" appears to be the original reading. It may indicate that al-Muʿtaḍid was under the impression that Ḥamdān was still there.

[98] This anticipates later events. R, however, reads incorrectly: "captured and brought to al-Muʿtaḍid to a city."

[99] According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 270, al-Ḥasaniyyah was a place east of Mosul named after al-Ḥasan (b. ʿUmar al-Taghlibī), at a distance of two days travel between Mosul and Jazīrat Ibn ʿUmar (al-Taghlibī).

[100] There is no further information about him.

people undertaking the pilgrimage (fī al-muṣʿad).[101] More than five hundred people were affected.

In Shawwāl, 281 (December 4, 894-January 1, 895), the Muslims raided the Byzantines. The fighting between them lasted twelve days. The Muslims were victorious and gained much booty. Then they returned.[102]

[101] This is the common meaning of muṣʿad, also vocalized incorrectly as maṣʿad. The suggestion in Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCCXXIV, with reference to earlier passages, that the word refers to ʿArafah does not apply here. Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 147, 11. 20-23, gives a different account of the episode.

[102] See Canard, Sources arabes, 11. The concluding reference to the leader of the pilgrimage is missing here, see text above, n. 31.

The Events of the Year 282

(MARCH 2, 895 - FEBRUARY 18, 896)

One of the events was al-Muʿtaḍid's order, in al-Muḥarram, 282 (March 2-31, 895), that dispatches be drafted and sent to all government agents in the various districts and provincial centers stating that the collection of the land tax should not begin on New Year's Day—the Persian nayrūz—but that it should be postponed to Ḥazīrān 11 (June 11). This (new date) was called the Muʿtaḍidī New Year.[103] Dispatches were drafted to this effect and sent out from Mosul where al-Muʿtaḍid was at the time. In a dispatch concerning this sent to Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb[104] in Baghdad, al-Muʿtaḍid informed Yūsuf that he wanted to help the people and show kindness to them. He also ordered that his dispatch be read[105] in public, and this was done.

In this year, Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ arrived from Egypt with the daughter of Abū al-Jaysh Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn whom al-Muʿtaḍid had married.[106] She was accompanied by [103] With the end of the Sassanian Empire, the intercalary day of the Persian solar year came to be disregarded, with the result that New Year's Day moved back in the year by sixty days. It now fell so early in the year that the collection of the land tax started long before harvest time and caused great hardship to farmers. This fiscal reform was one of the most significant events of al-Muʿtaḍid's reign. It was considered as such already by Ibn al-Muʿtazz, who devoted many verses to it (224-47), and was always mentioned in connection with al-Muʿtaḍid. See Glagow, 140-42. For the precedent set by al-Mutawakkil, see text above, III, 1448.

---

[104] The qādī Abū Muḥammad Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb was born in 208 (823-4) and died on Monday, Ramaḍān 9, 297 (Tuesday, May 22, 910). He was appointed judge of the maẓālim court in 277 (890-1) (see text above, III, 2118). See Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XIV, 310-12; EI² Suppl., s. v. Ibn Dirham VIII. See also text above, III, 1942. For his son, Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad, see below, n. 217.

[105] R: "he ordered him to read his dispatch."

[106] See above, n. 16; Glagow, 63-67. For Qaṭr al-Nadā's gifts to al-Muʿtaḍid on New Year's Day 282, see Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhāʾir, 38f. They may have been brought with her on this trip.

one of her paternal uncles.[107] They entered Baghdad on Sunday, al-Muḥarram 2, 292 (Monday, March 3, 895), and the lady was [2144] brought to (her residence) // that night.[108] She settled in the (former) house of Ṣāʿid b. Makhlad,[109] as al-Muʿtaḍid was away in Mosul.

In this year, people were forbidden to pour water (upon passersby), raise bonfires,[110] parade grotesque figures,[111] and do other things they used to do on the Persian New Year's Day.

In this year, al-Muʿtaḍid wrote from Mosul to Isḥāq b. Ayyūb[112] and Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn ordering them to come to him. Isḥāq b. Ayyūb complied speedily and came to al-Muʿtaḍid, but Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn ensconced himself in his fortresses and sent his possessions and women away. Al-Muʿtaḍid sent the army against him with Waṣīf Mūshgīr,[113] Naṣr al-Qushūrī,[114]

---

[107] He was Abū al-Karādīs b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn. See Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhāʾir, 43. Qaṭr al-Nadā had also been accompanied to the borders of Egypt by her aunt al-ʿAbbāsah.

[108] Instead of "lady" (al-ḥurrah) as in R and C, the text has al-ḥaram "she was brought into the harem," no doubt a mistake. The party seems to have arrived in Baghdad late on Sunday, during the night of Sunday to Monday, and Qaṭr al-Nadā was immediately taken to her temporary residence. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 207, ed. Pellat, V, 173, wrongly indicates that her arrival took place in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 281.

[109] A convert to Islam, Ṣāʿid b. Makhlad was appointed secretary in 265 (879) (see text above, III, 1930). He served as a wazīr of al-Muʿtamid and al-Muwaffaq (Sourdel, Vizirat, 316ff.). His property was confiscated in 272 (885), and he died in 276 (889-90) (Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 101). His residence was used as a guest house after his death.

[110] Or "fireworks" (?).

[111] R adds wa-ikhrāj al-samāḥāt (read samājāt). For samājah, see text above, III, 1318. For further references, see also the editor's footnote in Shābushtī, Diyārāt, 26. Given their popularity, the New Year's customs mentioned could not be eliminated and continued to be observed on the Muʿtaḍidī New Year. See text below, 2163; Bīrūnī, Chronology, ed. Sachau, 266.

[112] He was in charge of security in Diyār Rabīʿah. See text above, III, 1942. For his death, see text below, 2193f.

[113] He appears first as a page of Abū al-ʿAbbās (al-Muʿtaḍid) before he became caliph. See text above, III, 2121. He died on Thursday, Ramaḍān 16, 299 (Thursday, May 7, 912). See ʿArīb, 37f. Mūshgīr means "mouse catcher" in Persian and refers to a bird of prey that feeds on mice.

[114] Naṣr al-Qushūrī appears here for the first time in Ṭabarī. As Ibn al-Athīr reports sub anno 282, he wrote a threatening letter to the Khārijite Hārūn and received a defiant reply. Al-Muʿtaḍid was thus determined to take energetic measures (see year 283). He sent al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī Kūrah against Hārūn on an expedition which was less than decisive. Under al-Muqtadir, Naṣr then played a great role as chamberlain. See, for instance, Massignon, *Passion*², I, 471-75.

and others. They encountered al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī Kūrah and his men who had stopped (to attack) one of Ḥamdān's fortresses in a place called Dayr al-Zaʿfarān[115] in the territory of Mosul. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān[116] was there, and when he saw the first troops coming, he sought a guarantee of safe-conduct and was granted it. At this, he went to al-Muʿtaḍid and handed the fortress over to him. Al-Muʿtaḍid ordered it to be destroyed. Waṣīf Mūshgīr went off in hot pursuit of Ḥamdān who had reached a place known as Bāsūrīn[117] between the Tigris and a large river where the water was high. Waṣīf's men crossed over to Ḥamdān. When he became aware of them, he and his men mounted and defended themselves, until most of them were killed. Ḥamdān then jumped into // a skiff that lay prepared [2145] for him in the Tigris, together with a Christian secretary of his called Zakariyyāʾ b. Yaḥyā.[118] He carried money along. He crossed over to the western bank of the Tigris in Diyār Rabīʿah, counting upon joining the Arab tribesmen, as he was separated from his Kurds on the eastern[119] bank. A small number of troops crossed over to pursue him. Eventually, they came within view of a monastery where he had halted. Upon seeing them, he fled from the monastery together with his secretary. The two then jumped into a skiff and left the money behind in the monastery, from where it was taken to al-Muʿtaḍid. The government troops went down in pursuit of Ḥamdān, (on land) on horseback and (in boats) on the water. When they caught up with him, he left the skiff unarmed[120] and went to an estate of his on the eastern bank of the Tigris. He mounted a horse belonging to his estate agent and traveled all night, until he reached the tent of Isḥāq b. Ayyūb in the camp of al-Muʿtaḍid who gave orders that he be guarded and sent cavalry in pursuit of his associates. His 115 The monastery has remained important to this day.

---

116 He died in 306 (918-9). See ʿArīb, 76f. See text above, n. 96.

117 Yāqūt mentions Bāsūrīn referring to the history of Ḥamdān, possibly relying on Ṭabarī. He indicates that it is in the administrative district of Mosul, east of the Tigris (Muʿjam, I, 467). See also Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 52, 54; Canard, Ḥamdanides, 301. Bāsūrīn, beginning with the abbreviated form of bēt, may be an Aramaic place-name. However, its second element may refer to the Persian Sūrēn.

118 No further information is available for him.

119 R: "western."

120 Text: khāsiran, read ḫāsiran as in R. Ḫāsir is commonly used with approximately the indicated meaning. See, for instance, text above, II, 1906.

secretary and a number of his relatives and pages were captured. At this, the chieftains of the Kurds and others, one after the other, asked for guarantees of safe-conduct. This took place at the end of al-Muḥarram, 282 (March 31, 895).

In Rabīʿ I, 282 (April 30-May 29, 895), Buktamir b. Ṭāshtamir[121] was seized, put in fetters, and incarcerated. His property, estates, and residences were also seized.

On Rabīʿ II 4, 282 (June 2, 895), the daughter of Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad was taken to al-Muʿtaḍid. It had been announced on both sides of Baghdad that on Sunday (June 1), nobody should cross the Tigris. The gates of the alleys adjacent to the river were locked. On each of the streets leading to the Tigris, police barricades made of canvass[122] were set up, and on both banks of [2146] the Tigris, deputies were stationed // to prevent anyone from appearing outside their houses on the river bank. After the night prayer, a barge arrived from the palace of al-Muʿtaḍid, carrying eunuchs with candles. They stopped in front of the house of Ṣāʿid. Four fast boats tied to the house of Ṣāʿid had been made ready, and when the barge came, they were lowered, and the barge then proceeded in front of the people (in the fast boats).[123] On Monday (June 2), the lady stayed in the palace of al-Muʿtaḍid. She was unveiled ⌜to him⌝ on Tuesday, Rabīʿ II[124] 5, 282 (Tuesday, June 3, 895).

In this year, al-Muʿtaḍid went to al-Jabal. Reaching al-Karaj he seized property belonging to Ibn Abī Dulaf and wrote to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf asking him for jewels[125] that were in his possession. ʿUmar sent them to him but kept away from the Caliph.

---

[121] Regarding him, see text above, III, 1885.

[122] See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCCIX and DCCXCVII. R: shirāʿ "sails." Sails strung up would have blocked the view of the river, but sharāʿij "sacks made of palm leaves" would serve well as barricades.

[123] This could mean that the fast boats pulled up alongside the barge, and Qaṭr al-Nadā was transferred from a fast boat to it.

[124] Text: Rabīʿ I. Although this is wrong, it is also found in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 150; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 27. R has the correct Rabīʿ II.

[125] The plural is more likely here than one specific jewel. Jawhar could mean both singular and plural.

In this year, after al-Muʿtaḍid had left Baghdad, Lu'lu',[126] the page of Ibn Ṭūlūn, was released and given horses and mules to ride.

In this year, Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj was sent to al-Ṣaymarah to reinforce Fatḥ al-Qalānisī,[127] the page of al-Muwaffaq, with a number of officers and about two thousand men attached to al-Qalānisī. However, he fled with those loyal to him to his brother Muḥammad in al-Marāghah. On his way, he came upon property belonging to the government and seized it. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir[128] said concerning this:

O rightly guided Imām! Your supporters, the family[129] of Ṭāhir,
Have been treated harshly over the years.

They have constantly combined steadfastness with gratitude,
Whereas someone else, who has been given many gifts, absconds.//

[2147]

In this year, al-Muʿtaḍid sent the wazīr ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān to al-Rayy to his son Abū Muḥammad. ʿUbaydallāh and Badr arrived and stayed, and al-Muktafī left. Badr and ʿUbaydallāh then went after Bakr b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. They stayed for a while in some of the regions of al-Rayy, but when Takīn did not come to them, they went toward Ṭabaristān.[130]

---

[126] Lu'lu', who had controlled northern and northeastern Syria for Ibn Ṭūlūn, defected to Abū Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq in 269 (882-3) (see text above, III, 2028f.). On Dhū al-Qaʿdah 22, 273 (April 20, 887), he was imprisoned by al-Muwaffaq, and his property, amounting reportedly to four hundred thousand dīnārs, was confiscated. According to him, the only reason for the treatment meted out to him was his great wealth (see text above, III, 2112). He died in 304 (916-7). See ʿArīb, 63.

[127] I have not succeded in locating further information on him.

[128] The well-known Ṭāhirid died in his eighties on Saturday, Shawwāl 12, 300 (Saturday, May 22, 913). See ʿArīb, 40; Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XI, 340-4; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 117-9. On his poetical and literary activities, see Sezgin, GAS, I, 375, II, 612.

[129] R: "and the son."

[130] Although "al-Muktafī" replaces the more appropriate "Abū Muḥammad," there is no reason to assume that this addition of R did not originate somewhere in Ṭabarī's notes. However, since Badr is not mentioned before, it may be misplaced (see text below, 2178). The reference to Takīn (the same as text below, 2291 ?) derives from an uncertain reading of the manuscript and may be in error.

In this year, Muḥammad b. Zayd al-ʿAlawī[131] sent thirty-two thousand dīnārs from Ṭabaristān to Muḥammad b. Ward al-ʿAṭṭār[132] for distribution to his followers[133] in Baghdad and al-Kūfah as well as in Mecca and al-Madīnah. Muḥammad b. Ward was denounced and taken to the house of Badr and questioned about the matter. He mentioned that Muḥammad b. Zayd had been sending him the like amount of money every year, and he had subsequently distributed it among his followers in the way he had been ordered. Badr then informed al-Muʿtaḍid about this. He told him that the man and the money were in his hands, and asked him what he should do with him.

As mentioned on the authority of Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥasanī,[134] al-Muʿtaḍid asked Badr whether he did not remember the dream he once related to him. When Badr replied, "No, O Commander of the Faithful," al-Muʿtaḍid said, "Don't you remember that I told you that al-Nāṣir[135] called me and said to me, 'Know that the caliphate will be yours! Now (when you are caliph), be circumspect in your dealings[136] with the family of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib!' " Al-Muʿtaḍid continued, "I saw myself in a dream leaving Baghdad with my army for the district of al-Nahrawān. Many onlookers were watching me. I passed by a man standing upon a hill. He was praying and paid me no attention. I wondered about him and his lack of interest in my troops when all those people were watching them. I approached and stopped in front of him. When he finished his prayer, he asked me to come forward, and I did. He asked me whether I recognized him, and when I replied that I did not, he said, 'I am ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Take this spade'—pointing to a spade in front 131 Al-Qā'im bi-l-Ḥaqq (referred to, it seems, as al-Dāʿī ilā al-Ḥaqq, in text below, 2151) was the ruler of the Caspian Zaydīs from 270-87 (883-900) and apparently the brother of the founder of Zaydī rule there, al-Ḥasan b. Zayd b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Yaḥyā b. Zayd b. al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 205f., ed. Pellat, V, 172, briefly refers to this episode and to a dream in which al-Muʿtaḍid saw ʿAlī, as proof of al-Muʿtaḍid's pro-ʿAlid leanings.

---

132 There is no further information on him.

133 Here and below, R has "the ʿAlawīs," which appears also in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 150.

134 Unidentified.

135 That is, al-Muʿtaḍid's father al-Muwaffaq.

136 Lit., "look out how you will be," which need not always be as positive as it appears to be meant here.

of him—'and hit the ground with it!' I took it and hit the ground with it several times. Then he said to me, 'The number of your descendants who will successively become caliphs will correspond to the number of times you have hit the ground. Exhort them to be good to my descendants!' " / / Badr said, "Yes, [2148]
O Commander of the Faithful, now I remember." Al-Muʿtaḍid continued, "So release the money and release the man, and tell him to write to his master in Ṭabaristān that anything he sends him he should send to him openly. Muḥammad b. Ward shall distribute whatever he does openly. Also, help Muḥammad to do as he wishes in this connection!"[137]

On Shaʿbān 18, 282 (October 12, 895), Abū Ṭalḥah Manṣūr b. Muslim[138] died in al-Muʿtaḍid's prison.

On Ramaḍān 8, 282 (October 31, 895), the wazīr ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān reached Baghdad from al-Rayy. Al-Muʿtaḍid bestowed a robe of honor upon him.

On Ramaḍān 22, 282 (November 14, 895), Nāʿim, a slave girl of Umm al-Qāsim bt. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh,[139] gave birth to a son of al-Muʿtaḍid whom he named Jaʿfar.[140] Al-Muʿtaḍid called this slave girl Shaghab.

---

[137] For another version, see Tanūkhī, Faraj, I, 132f., and for a different dream of the same meaning, see Masʿūdī (above, n. 131). For al-Muʿtaḍid's attitude toward the Daylam of Ṭabaristān, see Tanūkhī, Nishwār, I, 319ff.

As this is a contemporary report, we cannot dismiss the dream as a literary convention. The story was circulated for political purposes, and for all we know, the Caliph himself, or his advisers, circulated it. It indicates the policy line which al-Muʿtaḍid adopted, or was forced to adopt, toward the ʿAlid Shīʿites, that is, tolerance wherever possible and to the extent possible. In this particular case, it was apparently assumed that the propaganda of the Caspian Zaydīs constituted no immediate threat to Iraq and the Holy Cities, which were always politically troublesome. This might have been the case, even though the political problem posed by the Daylam at the northern border was great and required constant vigilance and action. Already in the following year, the Caspian Zaydīs took over Naysābūr for a while.

[138] See text above, III, 2121.

[139] Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 95, confirms that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh was the well-known Ṭāhirid [d. 253 (867); see text above, III, 1291] and the brother of the above mentioned ʿUbaydallāh (see n. 128). Nothing more is known about his daughter Umm al-Qāsim.

[140] That is, the future al-Muqtadir. His mother Shaghab played an important role during his reign. She died in 320 (932). See, for instance, ʿArīb, 186; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 253f., sub anno 321; Massignon, *Passion*², I, 446-53.

On Dhū al-Ḥijjah 18, 282 (February 7, 896), Ibrāhīm b. Aḥmad al-Mādharā'ī,[141] arrived in Baghdad from Damascus by way of the desert. He had reached Baghdad in eleven days. He informed al-Mu'taḍid that Khumārawayh had been murdered in his bed by one of the eunuchs attached to his inner circle. He was reportedly killed on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 3, 282 (January 23, 896). According to another report, Ibrāhīm reached Baghdad from Damascus in seven days. Some twenty of Khumārawayh's eunuchs who were suspected of his murder were put to death.[142]

Al-Mu'taḍid had sent gifts to Khumārawayh with Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ and had entrusted him with a message to Khumārawayh.[143] [2149] Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ had already left on his mission and reached // Sāmarrā when al-Mu'taḍid learned of Khumārawayh's death. He therefore wrote to Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ and ordered him to return, which he did. Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ entered Baghdad on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 23, 282 (February 12, 896).

---

[141] See Gottschalk, Mādarā'ijjūn, 51; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, V, 306. A secretary of Khumārawayh, he was there when the latter was killed. He died in 313 (925-6), at the age of sixty-six.

[142] According to Eutychius, Annales, text, 72, he was killed on the night of Sunday, Dhū al-Qa'dah 27 (Saturday, January 17). Eutychius also mentions the names of six eunuchs involved in the assassination.

[143] The robes of honor which al-Mu'taḍid sent to Khumārawayh and his brothers and which were worth fifty-three thousand dīnārs may have been part of these gifts. See Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 39.

The Events of the Year 283

(FEBRUARY 19, 896 - FEBRUARY 7, 897)

One of the events was al-Muʿtaḍid's departure, on al-Muḥarram 17, 283 (March 6, 896), for the district of Mosul on account of the Khārijite Hārūn, whom he subsequently defeated. His dispatch announcing the victory reached Madīnat al-Salām on Tuesday, Rabīʿ I 9, 283 (Monday, April 26, 896). The reason for his victory over him was as follows:

When al-Muʿtaḍid sent al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān with horsemen and foot soldiers from his household and others of his men against the Khārijite, al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān reportedly said to him, "If I bring the Khārijite to the Commander of the Faithful, I have three wishes for the Commander of the Faithful." Al-Muʿtaḍid told him to mention the wishes, and he said, "My first wish is for the release of my father. The other two I shall ask for after I have brought (the Khārijite) back." Al-Muʿtaḍid replied, "I grant you that, and now go!"

Al-Ḥusayn said that he required three hundred horsemen to be selected by himself, whereupon al-Muʿtaḍid sent three hundred horsemen with him together with (Waṣīf) Mūshgīr. Al-Ḥusayn then requested that the Commander of the Faithful order Mūshgīr not to oppose any of his commands, and al-Muʿtaḍid ordered Mūshgīr to do so.

Al-Ḥusayn went as far as the Tigris Ford,[144] and then ordered Waṣīf and those with him to stay there, telling him, "Hārūn will have to pass through here / / while fleeing. Don't leave the [2150] place, until he passes by you, then prevent him from crossing! I shall come to you, unless you receive word that I have been killed." Al-Ḥusayn then went in search of Hārūn, and upon finding him, he attacked. Both sides suffered losses, but the Khārijite Hārūn was routed. Meanwhile, Waṣīf had remained three days at the Ford when his companions said to him, "We have stayed too long in this desolate place; this has been harmful to us. We cannot be sure that Ḥusayn will not himself seize the Khārijite and get credit for the victory instead of us. The right thing to do is to follow them." Waṣīf listened to them and left.

[144] Apparently, a particular ford known as the Tigris Ford in the region of Mosul. Note, however, that B has "a ford in the Tigris."

Now the fleeing Khārijite arrived at the location of the Ford and crossed the river. Ḥusayn, coming in pursuit of him, did not see Waṣīf and his men in the place where he had left them, and he had no information about Hārūn and saw no trace of him. He started to ask for information about Hārūn and eventually learned about his having crossed the Tigris. He crossed the river in pursuit of him and came to one of the Arab tribes. When he asked them about the Khārijite, they concealed his whereabouts from him. As a result he intended to attack them, and he informed them that al-Muʿtaḍid was coming in his wake. They now informed him that the Khārijite had passed through their territory. Al-Ḥusayn left them his own horses, which had become weak and tired, and took some of theirs. He pursued the Khārijite, and, after several days, he made contact with him and about one hundred men with him.[145] The Khārijite implored him (not to fight) and made promises to him.[146] But Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān insisted upon fighting, and a battle took place. Ḥusayn reportedly threw himself at the Khārijite, but his men quickly got to him and seized him. Ḥusayn took him to al-Muʿtaḍid as someone who had peacefully surrendered without any preconditions. (In fulfilment of al-Ḥusayn's wish), al-Muʿtaḍid ordered that Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn's fetters be removed and that he be given generous gifts and shown kindness, until he[147] could come and release him and bestow a robe of honor upon him.

---

[145] R omits wa-al-Shārī, giving the mistaken impression that "about one hundred men" were with al-Ḥusayn.

[146] The normal meaning of tawaʿada, "to threaten," is unlikely here.

[147] Apparently, al-Muʿtaḍid. However, Miskawayh has " his son," which is possibly the better reading. See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCVII. In any case, the subject of "release," etc., would be the Caliph.

When the Khārijite was captured and // in al-Muʿtaḍid's hands, the Caliph returned to Madīnat al-Salām. Arriving there on Rabīʿ I 22, 283 (May 9, 896), he encamped at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah where he mustered the army. Al-Muʿtaḍid bestowed a robe of honor and a gold necklace upon al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān. The elephant[148] was adorned with cloth of brocade, and something like a woman's litter was set up on it for the Khārijite. He was seated in it, dressed in a cloak of brocade with a silken hood over his head.[149] [2151]

On Jumādā I 20, 283 (July 5, 896), al-Muʿtaḍid sent a written order to all the districts indicating that the surplus of inheritance shares be returned to the blood relatives (of the deceased), that the Office of Inheritances (Dīwān al-Mawārīth) be abolished, and that the officials in charge of the inheritances be dismissed.[150] Letters to this effect were dispatched and read from the pulpits.

In this year, ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār left Naysābūr. Rāfiʿ b. Harthamah went there while ʿAmr was away. He entered the city and included mention of the Ṭālibids Muḥammad b. Zayd and his father Zayd in the Friday sermon in the following manner: "O God! Give success to him who calls to the truth (al-dāʿī ilā al-ḥaqq)."[151] ʿAmr later returned to Naysābūr and encamped outside the city, digging a trench around his camp. This was on Rabīʿ II 10, 283 (May 18, 896). He remained there, keeping the inhabitants of Naysābūr under siege.

---

[148] The definite article may indicate that the special elephant customarily used on such occasions is meant. In reporting this episode, however, Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 169f., ed. Pellat, V, 157f., does not have the definite article. See, in particular, text above, III, 1303.

[149] For Hārūn's alleged objection to this treatment, see above, n. 75.

[150] The mawārīth dealt with estates for which there were not enough legal heirs to claim inheritance shares covering the entire estate. The question was whether the surplus was to go to the state or to the more remote agnates. Al-Muʿtaḍid's decision in favor of the second option must have been widely popular. The Caliph solicited legal opinions from his judges and followed the views expressed by Abū Khāzim (see below, n. 506) and Ibn Abī al-Shawārib (see below, n. 209) against Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb. See Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 161f. In 311 (923), it proved necessary to reaffirm al-Muʿtaḍid's (and al-Muktafī's) practice. On this occasion, the secretary Muḥammad b. Jaʿfar b. Thawābah (d. the following year; see *EI*², s. v. Ibn Thawāba) drafted a document restating the earlier arguments, and the original letter from Abū Khāzim addressed to Badr was reproduced. See Ṣābiʾ, Wuzarāʾ, 268-75.

[151] See above, n. 131.

On Monday, Jumādā II 4, 283 (Monday, July 19, 896), Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundāj,[152] Khāqān al-Mufliḥī,[153] Muḥammad b. Kumushjūr, who was known as Bunduqah,[154] Badr b. Juff,[155] the brother of Ṭughj, and Ibn Ḥasanaj[156] arrived in Baghdad from Egypt together with a number of officers to [2152] seek guarantees of safe-conduct. / / Their reason for going to al-Muʿtaḍid to seek guarantees of safe-conduct was their attempted assassination of Jaysh b. Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn.[157] They were denounced to him while Jaysh was out riding, and they were in his cortège. Thus they realized that he was aware of their plan. So they left the very same day and went into the desert, leaving their property and families behind. For several days, they wandered around and a number of them died of thirst. They emerged on the Mecca Road at a distance of a two or three days' journey above al-Kūfah.[158] The central authorities sent Muḥammad b. Sulaymān,[159] the commander of the army, to al-Kūfah to register their names (in the military roll), and rations[160] were made ready for them at al-Kūfah. When they approached Baghdad, rations, tents, and food were sent out to them. They went to al-Muʿtaḍid on the day of their arrival. Robes of honor were bestowed upon them, and each officer was given a horse complete

---

[152] RC: "Kundāj," an alternative of Kundājīk.

[153] Khāqān al-Mufliḥī is not heard from after 304-5 (916-7). See text below; ʿArīb, 19, 67; Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 18.

[154] Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 90, mentions a Muḥammad b. Lamjūr (sic) as the brother of Bunduqah b. Lamjūr, but this seems to be an error. "Bunduqah" means "pellet" and the like; "Kumushgūr" is Turkish/Persian "silver ass."

[155] As is true of the other brothers of Ṭughj (see above, n. 77), practically nothing is known about Badr. See below, n. 742.

[156] See text above, III, 2027, where he is identified as Rūmī b. Ḥasanaj.

[157] Jaysh did not last much longer as ruler. He was deposed on Jumādā II 10, 283 (July 25, 896), and he was killed in prison a few days later. See Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 94.

[158] "Above" appears to be used here in the sense of "south of" (in keeping with the orientation of medieval maps?).

[159] He is identical with the person identified as a secretary of al-Muwaffaq. See text above, III, 2122. Before he defected with his master to al-Muwaffaq, he was known as the secretary of the eunuch Lu'lu' al-Ṭūlūnī. He died in 304 (916-7). See text below; ʿArīb; Eclipse, I, 51f. (with biographical footnote). Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn allegedly had forebodings concerning the role that Muḥammad b. Sulaymān would play in the downfall of his dynasty. See Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 111, quoting al-Quḍāʿī.

[160] Waẓīfah is the per diem requirements of an official, noted on his employment record. For the word in this sense, see, for instance, Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 226, ed. Pellat, V, 182.

with reins and bridle. Robes of honor were bestowed upon the rest. They numbered altogether sixty men.[161]

On Saturday, Jumādā II 16, 283 (Saturday, July 31, 896), the wazīr ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān went to al-Jabal to wage war against Ibn Abī Dulaf in Iṣbahān.

In this year, a dispatch reportedly arrived at Baghdad from Ṭarsūs stating that a large number of Slavs[162] had raided the Byzantines. They had killed some of them, and, laying waste many villages, they had eventually reached Constantinople, where the Byzantines sought refuge and locked the gates of their capital. The Byzantine tyrant[163] then sent a message to the king of the Slavs stating, "Our religion and your religion are one and the same, so why do we kill each other?" The king of the Slavs replied, "This is the realm of my forefathers. I am not leaving unless one of us defeats the other." When the king of the Byzantines found he was unable to get rid of the ruler of the Slavs, he gathered the Muslims who were around, / / gave [2153] them weapons, and asked them to help him against the Slavs. They did so and routed the Slavs. Seeing that, however, the king of the Byzantines now feared for his own safety. Thus he sent (a military contingent) against them. He turned them back and took their weapons. Then he dispersed them all over the country, as a precaution against their rising up against him.[164]

In the middle of Rajab, 283 (August 28, 896), word reached Baghdad from Egypt that the Maghribī and Berber troops (in the Egyptian Army) had revolted against Jaysh b. Khumārawayh. They told him that they were not content with him as amīr and [161] Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 178, ed. Pellat, V, 160, adds that they went via Wādī al-Qurā (al-ʿUlā, the ancient Dedan), thus taking a very southern route before reaching the safety of the Mecca Road.

---

[162] That is, the Bulghars.

[163] That is, Leon VI (886-912).

[164] See Vasiliev, II, 129f.; Canard, Sources arabes, 5, 13. The Bulghars under Symeon were provoked by Stylianos who exercised power under Leon VI, until he died in 896 and was succeeded by Leon's favorite, Samonas, an Arab convert. See Bréhier, Monde byzantin, II, 147ff.; L. Rydén, "The Portrait of the Arab Samonas in Byzantine Literature," Graeco-Arabica, 3 (Athens 1984), 101-108.

that he should remove himself so they could appoint his paternal uncle.[165] Jaysh's secretary, ʿAlī b. Aḥmad al-Mādharāʾī,[166] talked to them, asking them to leave Jaysh alone for the day. They left, but they returned the following day. Jaysh proceeded against the paternal uncle whom they had mentioned as their choice for amīr. He had him decapitated along with a another paternal uncle of his[167] and had their heads[168] hurled at the (rebellious) troops. The latter now assaulted Jaysh b. Khumārawayh, killing him and killing his mother.[169] They also looted his palace, and looted and set fires in the Egyptian capital. They replaced Jaysh with his brother Hārūn b. Khumārawayh.[170]

In Rajab, 283 (August 14-September 12, 896), al-Muʿtaḍid gave orders that the Dujayl Canal be cleared out, regardless of effort and expense, and that a rock in the Canal's mouth which was preventing the flow of water be removed. For that purpose, a levy of some four thousand dīnārs was reportedly collected from the owners of estates and fiefs and spent on the project. The secretary of Zīrak[171] and one of al-Muʿtaḍid's eunuchs were placed in charge of it.

In Shaʿbān, 283 (September 13-October 11, 896), ransom negotiations organized by Aḥmad b. Ṭughān[172] took place between the Muslims and the Byzantines. The dispatch reaching Baghdad [2154] from Ṭarsūs about it reportedly read / / as follows:

---

[165] He was Abū al-ʿAshāʾir Naṣr. See Kindī, Wulāh, 242; al-ʿUyūn wa-l-ḥadāʾiq, ed. Dāwūd, I, 146; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 93f. In Balawī, Sīrat Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, 349, his name appears as Muḍar, which is very similar to Naṣr in the Arabic script.

[166] He was killed in this connection. See Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 93f.; Gottschalk, Mādarāʾiyyūn, 37-40.

[167] For Jaysh's treatment of his uncles Rabīʿah, Muḍar (see above n. 165), and Shaybān, see Ibn al-Dāyah, Mukāfaʾah, 102f. (see Rosenthal, Freedom, 57); Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 93f.

[168] R: bi-raʾsayhimā.

[169] Her name is apparently not recorded in the histories.

[170] The last of the Ṭūlūnids (except for a few days of the rule of his uncle Shaybān), he lost his life in 292 (904), as recorded in the following pages.

[171] I have not succeeded in identifying him. On Zīrak, see above, n. 72.

[172] For Aḥmad b. Ṭughān al-ʿUjayfī, the governor of Ṭarsūs, see text above, III, 2130. He also appears in the list of ransom negotiations compiled by Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 192, see Canard, Sources arabes, 12, 405; and he is mentioned in connection with the fate of Jaysh in Kindī, Wulāh, 243.

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate

I hereby inform you that Aḥmad b. Ṭughān publicly announced attendance at the ransom negotiations[173] on Thursday, Shaʿbān 4, 283 (Thursday, September 16, 896). On Friday, Shaʿbān 5, he went to Lāmis,[174] the Muslim encampment, having ordered the people to come out with him on that day. He led the Friday prayers and rode from the Friday Mosque in the company of Rāghib[175] and his mawlās. The notables of the town, the mawlās, the officers, and the volunteers, all in their finest raiment, left with him. People left for Lāmis in a steady stream until Monday, Shaʿbān 8, 283 (Monday, September 20, 896). The ransom negotiations took place the day after Monday, Shaʿbān 9 (September 21). The ransom negotiations between the two parties lasted twelve days. A total of 2,504[176] Muslim men, women, and children were ransomed. On Tuesday, Shaʿbān 22, 283 (Tuesday, October 5, 896), the Muslims released Samyūn,[177] the emissary of the king of the Byzantines, while the Byzantines simultaneously released Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Bāqī,[178] the Muslim emissary who had been dispatched to the ransom negotiations. The amīr (Aḥmad b. Ṭughān) and those with him then returned.[179] 173 All those who were called upon to attend were no doubt expected to make contributions toward the redemption of the prisoners.

---

174 Also al-Lāmis. The Lamos, a river in Cilicia, flows into the Mediterranean between ancient Soloi and Elaiusa, according to Pauly-Wissowa, s. v. Lamos. Apparently there was also a town of that name, located on the river near the Mediterranean coast. According to Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 177f. (Canard, Sources arabes, 401), the location of the ransom negotiations was thirty-five mīl (seventy km) from Ṭarsūs. See Honigmann, Ostgrenze, 44, and text below, n. 835; EI², s. v. Lamas-şu.

175 A mawlā of al-Muwaffaq. See text above, III, 2132; for his death in 286 (899), see text below, 2190.

176 R: "2,534," which may be correct against all the contrary evidence (Sibṭ Ibn al-Jawzī; Ibn al-Athīr; Canard, Sources arabes, 167).

177 Both R and C indicate n instead of y, but Symeon is the name that immediately suggests itself. Samonas (see above, n. 164) is hardly a possibility.

178 Yaḥyā b. ʿAbd al-Bāqī al-Thaghrī or al-Adhanī, a Baghdadi ḥadīth scholar, who died in Adana or Ṭarsūs in Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 292 (August-September, 905). See Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XIV, 227f. He was no doubt a member of the Adana family to which the prominent ʿAdī b. Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Bāqī belonged (see below, n. 965).

179 The foregoing does not seem to be a literal quotation of the dispatch which apparently ends at this point.

In this month, after his return from the ransom negotiations, Aḥmad b. Ṭughān reportedly left (Ṭarsūs) by sea. He left Damyānah[180] behind to take care of his administrative functions there. He then sent Yūsuf b. al-Bāghmardī[181] to take charge of Ṭarsūs after him. Aḥmad himself did not return to Ṭarsūs.

On Friday, Ramaḍān 10, 283 (Thursday, October 21, 896), a dispatch was read from the pulpit of the Friday Mosque of Madīnat al-Salām indicating that on Saturday, Sha'bān 26, 283 (Saturday, October 9, 896), 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Abī Dulaf [2155] had come to Badr and ' Ubaydallāh b. // Sulaymān to ask for a guarantee of safe-conduct. He had come declaring his complete obedience, submissiveness, and loyalty to the Commander of the Faithful, and expressing his willingness to go with them to the Caliph's court. 'Ubaydallāh b. Sulaymān had gone to him and having met him, had taken him to Badr's tent where he had exacted the oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful from him and from his household and his men. Badr had bestowed robes of honor upon 'Umar and the chiefs of his household, whereupon they all had gone to the tent that had been prepared for them.[182]

Earlier, Bakr b. 'Abd al-'Azīz had gone to Badr and 'Ubaydallāh ⌜b. Sulayman⌝ to ask for a guarantee of safe-conduct. They had turned the administrative functions of his brother 'Umar over to him, on condition that he go out against 'Umar and fight him. Now, when 'Umar came to ask for a guarantee of safe-conduct, Badr and 'Ubaydallāh b. Sulaymān told Bakr, "Your brother has now become loyal to the central authorities. We [180] The vocalization is based on Greek Damianos. He was the page of the eunuch Yāzmān who had switched allegiance to Khumārawayh in 277 (890) and died on Friday, Rajab 14, 278 (Friday, October 22, 891). See text above, III, 2130.

---

[181] Yūsuf (b. Ibrāhīm) b. Bāghmardī was not to replace Damyānah but to strengthen his hand (see text below, 2160f.). "After him" therefore refers to Ibn Ṭughān whose position Yūsuf was to take over as military chief, while Damyānah retained political control. Instead of al-Bāghmardī, Bughāmardī appears in the text below, 2257. However, this may be a different individual. What relationship, if any existed between him and Ja'far b. al-Bāghmardī (see text above, III, 2084) is not clear. See also Balawī, Sīrat Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, 298.

[182] The contents of the dispatch most likely ends here.

turned his administrative functions over to you, assuming that he was disloyal. Now, it is up to the Commander of the Faithful to decide about your status. Therefore, both of you go to his court!"

ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī was appointed governor of Iṣbahān, ostensibly on behalf of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. Consequently, Bakr fled with his men. Al-Muʿtaḍid was informed[183] about this by letter, and he wrote to Badr ordering him to stay put, until Bakr's story and situation could be clarified. Badr remained where he was, while the wazīr ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān went to Abū Muḥammad ʿAlī b. al-Muʿtaḍid in al-Rayy.

Bakr b. ʿAbd al-Azīz b. Abī Dulaf had reached al-Ahwāz, and al-Muʿtaḍid sent Waṣīf Mūshgīr in search of him. Waṣīf left Baghdad on this assignment, going as far as the border of Fārs. He reportedly caught up with Bakr b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, but he did not attack him. They camped the night near one another. However, Bakr left during the night, and Waṣīf did not pursue him. // Bakr went on to Iṣbahān, while Waṣīf returned to Baghdad. [2156]

Al-Muʿtaḍid then wrote to Badr and ordered him to search for Bakr and his Arab tribesmen,[184] and Badr passed the order on to ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī. Bakr b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz composed the following poem:[185]

(1) Keep your blame away from me! This is no time for blaming.
Begone! The scout of blamers has come upon infertile ground.[186]

(2) The shades[187] (of the dark hair) of youth have flown from my temples.
My time of quarrelsomeness and impetuosity is gone.

---

[183] R: "Badr informed al-Muʿtaḍid."

[184] Text: wa-ʿarabihī; RB: wa-ḥarbihī. C remains to be checked.

[185] The poem appears in the edition of Bakr's collected poems, ed. Muḥammad Yūsuf al-Sūratī, 1-3 (Delhi 1937). Al-Sūratī's publication, it may be noted, consists of two parts with separate pagination, the first being Shiʿr al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī and the second Shiʿr Bakr....

The sequence of the verses in the Dīwān as compared to Ṭabarī's text is 1-2, 4, 3, 5-7, 9, 8, 14-17, 10-13, and 18-21. The Dīwān inserts one verse between verses 2 and 4, one between verses 6 and 7, two after versus 9/8, two or three between verses 16 and 17, two after verse 13, and one between verses 19-20. Only some of the textual variants have been noted here.

[186] See the Dīwān and Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCVII. Nöldeke's reading is supported by R and C.

[187] Text: ʿināyāt; RC: ghayābāt.

(3) The friends have thrown their sticks down[188] in the Iraq,
And I have remained the target of events.[189]
(4) The breaking of family ties has thrown rocks at the remote man[190]
And shot him far so as to be far away.
(5) The Arab tribesmen who fled have become distant,[191]
Although I have defended their honor with my sword,
(6) Which holds together their weakened condition,
And with spears, when people were clashing.[192]
(7) I shall crush the rock of a time which has befallen them[193]
In a forceful way that breaks firmly grounded mountains.
(8) I shall hit the pates in defense of their womenfolk,
[2157] As a cook hits an animal destined to be slaughtered. //
(9) And I shall leave those who come to their cisterns
At a place in which to plant their feet.[194]
(10) O Badr! Were you to witness the place where I stand,
While death looks on and the sides of the swords are dripping blood,
(11) You would find it blameworthy to cause me, as you do, the loss of dignity,
And you would be unable[195] to cast off my honor.
(12) You have set me in motion after I was still—You have succeeded only
In setting in motion something as strong as the mountains familiar to the inhabitants of the Tihāmah.[196]

---

188 That is, they stay put.

189 This half-verse is transferred in the Dīwān to verse 6, where it takes the place of the second half-verse. The Dīwān has: "They have stopped in a house to halt and stay."

190 That is, the poet himself who is now in the unhappy situation of the stranger far away from his home and friends.

191 Text: *tasha*ᶜ*aba; Dīwān: takhādhala* "abandoned each other." The easier reading of the Dīwān is possibly less correct.

192 See above, n. 189.

193 R: haddahum "crushed them."

194 Text: li-mawāṭi'i, but a wrong connection with the root wṭn (for wṭ') is indicated in all three Ṭabarī manuscripts and is presumably the mistake of Ṭabarī himself.

195 Text: dhirᶜuka. All three Ṭabari manuscripts read ᶜudhruka, which seems incorrect.

196 By setting in motion my fortress, you have only succeeded in setting in motion something as powerful as the mountains familiar from the Tihāmah. However, the Dīwān has the easier and probably more correct reading ḥarrakta min qaḍafī jibāla shamāmi. By setting in motion my hillock, you have succeeded only in setting in

(13) You have tried me, and found me strong,
Tough on every battle day.
(14) Tell the amīr Abū Muḥammad[197] who Illumines with his splendor the darkest darkness:
(15) You have enabled me to dwell in the shade on top, and I did
In luxurious living and growing power,
(16) Until, when I was debarred from it, there happened to me
What happened, and my days changed for the worse.
(17) I shall indeed be grateful to you for the good things you have done for me,
As long as the grey pigeons coo in the woods.// [2158]
(18) This Abū Ḥafṣ[198] is my support and my treasure
In all untoward happenings and my armament and my chief.
(19) I called him, and he answered me. I shook him
And thereby shook the edge of a cutting sword.
(20) He who wants to close the eyelids when there is a mote in the eye,
Or wants to be humble desires what must not be desired.
(21) He recoils cowardly when he sees the spear pointing
And the swords drawn to hit the pates.

---

motion the mountain range Shamām(i), located in the territory of the Banū Qushayr or the Banū Ḥanifah and often mentioned in ancient poetry, as indicated in al-Bakrī and Yāqūt (s. v. Shamāmi).

[197] The future al-Muktafī, who was mentioned in the text above as being in al-Rayy at the time.

[198] For yadī "my support," the Dīwān has akhī "my brother." However this need not mean that "Abū Ḥafṣ" refers to a brother of the poet; it could be a friend. Abū Ḥafṣ is replaced in the Dīwān by Abū Naṣr. So far, the individual meant here has not been identified.

Bakr b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz mentioned[199] al-Nūsharī's flight before him, and he slandered Waṣīf for drawing back in fear of him, and he threatened Badr, in these verses:[200]

(1) The fair-skinned maidens say: Bakr has changed.
He was together (with us); now he keeps away.[201]
(2) There is no friend like the sword when
A distressing event occurs and there are problems.
(3) They kindled war among us—and he got hot from it.
They then turned away,[202] but where can one flee from it?
(4) They have meant to do evil unto us. This, therefore, is a time
Whose evil has become apparent and is followed by more evil.
(5) Al-Nūsharī has seen, when we met in battle,
Who is the one who flees when the spears are pointed.
(6) He came with a large army, but we undertook
An assault which would make heroes whine.
(7) The standard of Mūshgīr has come to us, While the swords and lances were becoming moist (with [2159] blood).[203] / /
(8) My kindness and excessive patience[204] and forbearance
Have deceived Badr. They are deceptive attitudes.
(9) Tough,[205] slender, lean, intensely colored
Reddish brown horses will come to him.
(10) Aggressive lions of the Banū Wā'il
Will compete on them which are like demons.[206]

---

[199] Text: yadhkur; R: ḥīna.

[200] In the edition of al-Sūratī, 5f., the verse order is the same as in Ṭabarī, but the Dīwān has more verses between verses 1 and 2 (two), 4 and 5 (one), 6 and 7(one), 7 and 8 (three), and 10 and 11 (one).

[201] Lovers like to be together. They fear most to be separated or to be shunned by their partners. The circumstances in which Bakr finds himself leave him no time for love. Attentive as he was before to girls, he must now perforce keep away from them.

[202] Text: ḥāṣū; Dīwān and RC: khāmū. The meaning is essentially the same.

[203] The reading of the Dīwān: wa-bilālun rawīna bīḍun wa-sumru appears also in R (and B). It was possibly substituted for Ṭabarī's original reading (preserved in C) by someone acquainted with the poem.

[204] The reading anātī, suggested by Nöldeke, is confirmed by R and C and, in fact, is also suggested by B.

[205] Shawāzib, as in the Dīwān and all three manuscripts.

[206] Saʿālī was used for horses according to a verse quoted in Lisān al-ʿArab, s. v. sʿl. The ʿIjl, to whom Abū Dulaf al-ʿIjlī belonged, were part of the Bakr b. Wā'il.

(11) I would not be Bakr if I do not leave them talked about,[207]
As long as a star travels and time revolves.

On Friday, Shawwāl 7, 283 (Wednesday, November 17, 896),[208] ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Shawārib[209] died and was carried in a casket to Sāmarrā the very same day. He had held the post of chief judge in Madīnat Abī Jaʿfar for six months.

On Monday, Shawwāl 25(26), 283 (Monday, December 6, 896), ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Dulaf entered Baghdad coming from Iṣbahān. Al-Muʿtaḍid reportedly ordered the high officers to receive him, and he was received by al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh[210] as well as the officers. Al-Muʿtaḍid granted him an audience, and presented him with gifts. He bestowed a robe of honor upon him and gave him a horse to ride with a saddle and bridle adorned with gold. At the same time, he bestowed robes of honor upon his two sons and upon the son of his brother Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz[211] as well as two of his officers. He was lodged in the house that had belonged to ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh[212] at the head of the bridge. The residence was refurnished for him.

In this year, a letter which arrived in Baghdad from ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār was read to the officers in al-Muʿtaḍid's palace. It indicated that ʿAmr had attacked Rāfiʿ b. Harthamah and routed him, and that Rāfiʿ was continuing his flight with ʿAmr in pursuit. The battle had taken place on Ramaḍān 25, 283 (September 17, 896). The letter was read on Tuesday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 12, 283 (Tuesday, December 21, 896)/ / [2160]

---

[207] That is, his people will become "a story," the subject of conversation, because of his bravery and heroic deeds.

[208] The discrepancy in the days of the week shows that something is amiss here, and, in fact, Ibn Abī al-Shawārib's death occurred on the night of Saturday, Shawwāl 10, 283 (Sunday, November 20, 896). See Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XII, 59f.

[209] Ibn Abī al-Shawārib's appointment to the judgeship is mentioned in the text above, III, 1907, sub anno 262 (875-6). Regarding him see, for instance, Taʾrīkh Baghdād (preceding note); Dhahabī, ʿIbar, II, 71, quoted by Ibn al-ʿImād, Shadharāt, II, 185.

[210] Abū al-Ḥusayn al-Qāsim, d. 291 (904), see text below, 2250; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 46f.; Sourdel, Vizirat, 345-57.

[211] I have no further information on the sons of Aḥmad and ʿUmar.

[212] That is, Ibn Ṭāhir.

On Sunday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 17, 283 (Sunday, December 25, 896), a mail pouch from ʿAmr b. al-Layth reportedly reached al-Muʿtaḍid when he was in the hippodrome. He returned to the Dār al-ʿĀmmah,[213] and the letter from ʿAmr ⌜b. al-Layth⌝ was read to the officers. In it ʿAmr stated that he had sent Muḥammad b. ʿAmr al-Balkhī[214] and another of his officers in pursuit of Rāfiʿ after he was routed. Rāfiʿ had reached Ṭūs when they attacked him. He was routed (again), and they pursued him. He reached Khuwārizm, where he was killed. Together with the letter, ʿAmr b. al-Layth sent Rāfiʿ's signet. He also mentioned that he had given the courier a message for the central authorities concerning Rāfiʿ's head.

On Friday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 22, 283 (Friday, December 31, 896), the letters about the killing of Rāfiʿ b. Harthamah were read from the pulpits.

---

[213] The Dār al-ʿĀmmah, the outer compound of the great palace complex which was known as the Dār al-Khilāfah, entered through the Bāb al-ʿĀmmah. See Le Strange, Baghdad, 275; Busse, "Hofbudget," 30f.

[214] I have not found further information about him.

The Important Events of the Year 284

(FEBRUARY 8, 897 - JANUARY 27, 898)

One of the events was the arrival of the courier of ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār with the head of Rāfiʿ b. Harthamah. He arrived in Baghdad on Thursday, al-Muḥarram 4, 284 (Friday, February 11, 897). Al-Muʿtaḍid ordered the head exhibited at the Police Station on the East Side until noon; it was then to be transferred to the West Side and exhibited there until night when it was to be returned[215] to the Caliph's palace. When the courier came to al-Muʿtaḍid with the head, a robe of honor was bestowed upon him.

On Thursday, Ṣafar 7, 284 (Wednesday, March 16, 897), fighting took place in Ṭarsūs between Rāghib and Damyānah. The reason for the conflict was reported to have been as follows: Rāghib, the mawlā of al-Muwaffaq, had omitted the prayer for Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad and instead prayed for Badr, the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, thereby causing dissension between himself and Aḥmad b. Ṭughān. When Aḥmad b. Ṭughān returned / / from [2161] the ransom negotiations which took place in the year 283 (896), he went by sea and did not re-enter Ṭarsūs. Continuing on, he left Damyānah behind to administer affairs in the city. Then, in Ṣafar of this year (March 10-April 7, 897), he sent Yūsuf b. al-Bāghmardī to take his place in Ṭarsūs. When the latter entered the city and Damyānah was strengthened by his presence, people expressed disapproval for Rāghib's praying for Badr, and trouble started among them. Rāghib defeated them and sent Damyānah, Ibn al-Bāghmardī, and Ibn al-Yatīm[216] to al-Muʿtaḍid in fetters.

---

215 R: "then it was returned."

216 Presumably, a son (?) of Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Wahhāb al-Yatīm who is mentioned by Ibn Saʿīd, Mughrib, ed. Vollers, 70, l. 21, in connection with events in Ṭarsūs in 269 (882-3). Al-Kindī, Wulāh, 317, does not have "al-Yatīm."

On Monday, Ṣafar 19, 284 (Monday, March 28, 897), a mail pouch arrived in Baghdad from al-Jabal with the information that al-Nūsharī had attacked Bakr b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf within the borders of Iṣbahān. He had killed his men and permitted the looting of his camp. Bakr had escaped with a few people.

On Thursday, Rabīʿ I 14, 284, (Thursday, April 21, 897), a robe of honor was bestowed upon Abū ʿUmar Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb on the occasion of his appointment as qāḍī of Madīnat Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr replacing ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Shawārib. His jurisdiction included Quṭrabbul, Maskin, Buzurjsābūr, and the two Rādhān.[217] On the very same day, he heard lawsuits in the Friday Mosque. Madīnat Abī Jaʿfar had been without a judge between the death of Ibn Abī al-Shawārib and the appointment of Abū ʿUmar, that is, a period of five months and four days.

[2162] On Wednesday, Rabīʿ I 13, 284 (Wednesday, April 20, 897), // a Christian eunuch ⌜called Waṣīf⌝ belonging to Ghālib al-Naṣrānī,[218] the Caliph's physician, was seized and remanded to

---

[217] Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad, the son of Abū Muḥammad Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb, is meant here. He was born on Rajab 9, 243 (November 1, 857), and died on Wednesday, Ramaḍān 23, 320 (Thursday, September 27, 932). See Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, III, 401-5; EI² Suppl., s. v. Ibn Dirham IX; above, n. 104.

All the places mentioned here formed part of the larger surburban area to the north of Baghdad in the Dujayl region between Baghdad and Sāmarrā. For Quṭrabbul, see Le Strange, Lands, 50f.; for Maskin, Lassner, Topography, 279, n. 11. Buzurjsābūr is identified with ʿUkbarā, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 604, and III, 705. For the two Rādhān, op. cit., II, 729. See also Eclipse, I, 193: Ṣābiʾ, Wuzarāʾ, 15; Busse, "Hofbudget," 15.

[218] Ghālib al-Naṣrānī had been a physician of al-Muwaffaq since the days of al-Mutawakkil. He gained great wealth as a physician of al-Mutawakkil's family, and his reputation grew when he cured al-Muwaffaq of an arrow-wound. He became one of the prominent members of al-Muʿtaḍid's large corps of physicians. According to Thābit b. Sinān b. Thābit, he died in Āmid during al-Muʿtaḍid's stay there between May and early June 286 (see text below, 2186f.). On the occasion of Ghālib's death, al-Muʿtaḍid showed extraordinary consideration for his son, Saʿīd, who also served as his physician. Saʿīd died on Sunday, Jumādā II 24, 307 (Sunday, November 21, 919). See Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿah, ʿUyūn, I, 230f.

In view of Ghālib's close relationship to the Caliph, the event, which caused a considerable stir (see below, n. 222), was obviously most embarrassing to al-Muʿtaḍid, and it is no wonder that every attempt was made to cover it up.

prison. Witnesses testified that he had slandered the Prophet. The day after the eunuch was incarcerated, some of the general populace gathered on his account. They shouted at al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh and demanded of al-Qāsim that in view of the testimony against the eunuch, he should apply the legal punishment to him. On Sunday, Rabīʿ I 17, 284 (Sunday, April 24, 897), the people of Bāb al-Ṭāq gathered at the Baradān Bridge[219] and the adjacent bazaars. They consulted with one another and agreed to go to the Caliph's palace,[220] where they were met by Abū al-Ḥusayn, the wazīr's son. They shouted at him, and he informed them that he had already passed on the eunuch's story to al-Muʿtaḍid in al-Thurayyā.[221] Considering him a liar, they called him names and then assaulted his bodyguards and men, who eventually fled before them. They went to al-Muʿtaḍid's Thurayyā palace, but having passed through the first and second gates, they were prevented from entering (into al-Muʿtaḍid's presence). They now assaulted those who were preventing them from entering. Someone came out to inquire about them, and they told him their story. Al-Muʿtaḍid was informed about it in writing, and a number of them were then allowed to enter into his presence. He asked them about the story, and they recounted it to him, whereupon he sent Khafīf al-Samarqandī with them to the qāḍī Yūsuf. He charged Khafīf with ordering the qāḍī to look into the eunuch's case and report the result to him. Khafīf thus went with them to Yūsuf. When they were about to enter the house (of the qāḍī), there was such a turmoil that they almost killed both Khafīf and Yūsuf. Passing through a door and locking them out, Yūsuf managed to escape from them. *In this connection, Ibn Bassām[222] said:

---

[219] See Le Strange, Lands, 206; Lassner, Topography, index (Qanṭarat al-Baradān).

[220] Text: bāb; RC: dār. Abū al-Ḥusayn is al-Qāsim.

[221] The Thurayyā was one palace in the great complex known as the Dār al-Khilāfah, see Lassner, Topography, index.

[222] Ibn Bassām is the well-known poet and perennial satirist Ibn Bassām al-Bassāmī, d. 302 or 303 (914-5). See Sezgin, GAS, II, 589. While the wazīr's family was of Christian origin, the reference to al-Qāsim's father ʿUbaydallāh as a Christian merely shows the prejudice of the satirist and his environment.

Al-Qāsim's concern for the eunuch
Shows the religion of the father of al-Qāsim.

If the person slandered had been ʿĪsā, one would not have Been satisfied with anything but killing the slanderer.*

After that, the eunuch was no longer mentioned, and the [2163] populace no longer gathered in connection with his case. / /

Also in Rabīʿ I 284 (April 9-May 7, 897), some inhabitants of Ṭarsūs reportedly went to the central authorities with the request that a governor be appointed for them, mentioning that their city was without one. Ṭarsūs had earlier been in the hands of Ibn Ṭūlūn, but he treated them badly, so that they drove his agent out of the city.[223] Ibn Ṭūlūn corresponded with them about the matter and promised them better treatment, but they refused to let any page of his enter their city. They said that they would fight anyone coming on his behalf. He therefore left them alone.

On Thursday, Rabīʿ II 26, 284 (Thursday, June 2, 897), darkness reportedly fell upon Egypt, and there was a redness on the sky which was so strong that when someone looked someone else in the face, the face looked red to him. It was the same with walls and other things. This lasted from the afternoon prayer to the second evening prayer. Leaving their residences, people prayed to God and beseeched Him.[224]

---

[223] See Canard, Sources arabes, 13.

[224] The same event is described in more detail by Eutychius, Annales, 72f. He dates it "on the night of Thursday, Rabīʿ I 28, 284 (Thursday, May 5, 897), on the Christian holiday of the ascension of our Lord Christ into Heaven." May 5 of that year was in fact Ascension Day, and the Christian Egyptian historian can be trusted to have preserved the correct date. Note that Ṭabarī indicates the correct day of the week. He possibly noted down the date of the event and the date when the news of it reached Baghdad, and the error occurred when the work was made ready for publication.

After his reference to this event, Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 113, adds: "In this year, ʿAmr b. al-Layth sent a million dirhams for improvements on the Mecca Road, as stated by Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī." The reference to Ṭabarī is either misplaced and belongs to the statement on the atmospheric phenomenon in Egypt, or qālahū should be qāla and introduces the following brief summary of al-Muʿtaḍid's planned action against supporters of the Umayyads. The statement probably does not go back to a recension of Ṭabarī's work.

On Wednesday, Jumādā I[225] 3, 284 (Wednesday, June 8, 897), corresponding to Ḥazīrān 11 (June 11),[226] it was announced in the quarters and bazaars of Baghdad that it was forbidden to kindle bonfires on New Year's eve and to pour water (upon passersby) on New Year's Day. The announcement was repeated on Thursday (June 9), but on Friday[227] evening, it was announced at the office (bāb) of Saʿīd b. Yaksīn,[228] the chief of police on the East Side of Madīnat al-Salām, that the Commander of the Faithful had given permission for people to kindle bonfires and pour water. At this, the populace exceeded the bounds of propriety and reportedly[229] poured water even upon the policemen at the Police Station at the Bridge. This was one of Islam's greatest troubles ever and was most reminiscent of the Antichrist and his companions. Moreover, it was an open show of despicable disloyalty.[230]

In this year, the populace, whenever they saw a black eunuch, became fond[231] of shouting, "O // ʿaqīq!"[232] That made the eunuchs angry. Now, on a Friday evening, al-Muʿtaḍid sent a black eunuch with a note to Ibn Ḥamdūn al-Nadīm.[233] When the eunuch reached the head of the Bridge on the East Side, [2164]

---

225 R: "Jumādā II," which is in error.

226 This should be Ḥazīrān 8 (June 8). The error was caused by the fact that the New Year's Day itself fell on Ḥazīrān 11.

227 RC: "Thursday."

228 RC: "Taksīn." For Ibn Yaksīn, see text above, III, 1838. He was governor of al-Ahwāz in 256 (870).

229 It seems that R had "reportedly" after the following addition.

230 R: wa-kāna dhālika min aʿẓam fitan al-Islām wa-ashbah shay' bi-al-dajjāl wa-aṣḥābihī maʿa iẓhār al-munkar wa-al-maʿāṣī. The first five words are also found in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 171, 11. 6f. The statement seems a gross exaggeration. Perhaps Ṭabarī himself toned it down during his lifetime.

231 Text: ughribat; R clearly indicates ughriyat.

232 Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 180, ed. Pellat, V, 161, refers to an alleged extension of the taunt, which is clear in its sexual innuendo. However, as far as I know, the significance of ʿaqīq is still unexplained. Even if ʿaqīq could have the same meaning as ʿāqq "disobedient son," it is quite uncertain whether this could mean that a eunuch cannot fulfill his father's desire for grandchildren. Perhaps, ʿaqīq is to be understood in its ordinary meaning of "ruby" (a dark red) and refers to the physical deformity or scar caused by castration, or it is a slave name like Yāqūt. See Mez, Renaissance, 335.

233 ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm b. Dāwūd b. Ḥamdūn belonged to a well-known family (see *EI*², s. v. Ibn Ḥamdūn) of boon-companions and is often mentioned in the literature about this period. See also Rosenthal, Sarakhsī, 24, 26, 28. ʿAbdallāh died in 309 (921-2) (Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, XI, 144).

someone in the crowd taunted him, "O ʿaqīq!" The eunuch cursed the man and whipped him. A crowd gathered, and knocked the eunuch off his feet, and beat him. The note he had with him was lost. Returning to the Caliph, the eunuch told him how he had been treated, whereupon al-Muʿtaḍid ordered the eunuch Ṭarīf al-Makhladī[234] to ride out and arrest and flog anybody who would take liberties with the eunuchs. On Saturday, Jumādā I 13, 284 (Saturday, June 18, 897), Ṭarīf rode out with a number of horsemen and foot soldiers. He had a black eunuch walk in front of him. Under orders to arrest anyone who would shout at a eunuch, "O ʿaqīq!," he reached Bāb al-Ṭāq, where he reportedly arrested seven persons; one of them was reportedly innocent.[235] They were flogged in the Police Station on the East Side. Ṭarīf then crossed the Tigris and went to al-Karkh, where he did the same thing. He seized eight[236] persons and had them beaten in the Police Station in al-Sharqiyyah.[237] All those people were paraded on camels, and it was announced that this was the punishment for those who took liberties with the Caliph's eunuchs and taunted them, "O ʿaqīq!" They were detained for the day and released at night.

In this year, al-Muʿtaḍid bi-llāh planned to have Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān cursed from the pulpits. He ordered the drafting of a document to this effect, to be read in public. ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān b. Wahb warned him that the populace might be disturbed and that he could not be sure that there would not be trouble. Al-Muʿtaḍid, however, paid no attention to what ʿUbaydallāh said.[238]

---

234 No further information about him could be found.

235 Barī'an "innocent" offers a plausible reading. Other readings are bazzīyan or badhī'an "lewd" (the latter suggested by von Kremer). It seems highly dubious that bazzīyan* could be equated with bazzāz and mean "cloth merchant." At any rate, it is not clear why either "cloth merchant" or "lewd" should be mentioned in the context. The former might indicate that even respectable individuals of good social standing were involved, but the latter should have some specific meaning here to warrant reference to it.

236 Text: "five"; RC: "eight."

237 For al-Sharqiyyah, see Lassner, Topography, index.

238 Although ʿUbaydallāh eventually signed the document, it is doubtful whether he had much of a say in drafting it.

Reportedly, the first thing // al-Muʿtaḍid did in this connection was to give orders that the populace be told to stick to their business and not to gather nor cause dissension[239] nor give testimony before the central authorities, unless[240] they were asked to testify as witnesses (regarding some matter). The storytellers, too, were to be prevented from sitting in the roads.[241] Documents were produced to be read on both sides of Madīnat al-Salām in the quarters, neighborhoods, and bazaars. They were read on Wednesday, Jumādā I 24, 284 (Wednesday, June 29, 897). Then, on Friday, Jumādā I 26, 284 (Friday, July 1, 897), the storytellers were prevented from sitting in the two Friday Mosques.[242] Groups studying legal opinions and other people were also prevented from sitting in the two Friday Mosques, and vendors were prevented from sitting in their stalls. In Jumādā II, 284 (July 6-August 3, 897), it was announced in the Friday Mosque that people were forbidden to gather around storytellers and other people, and the storytellers and study groups were prevented from holding sessions (there). On Jumādā II 11, 284 (July 16, 897), which was a Friday,[243] it was announced in the two Friday Mosques[244] that people who gather for discussion or disputation no longer enjoy legal protection, and whoever does so makes it legally permissible for him to be beaten. Drinkers and waterboys in the two Friday Mosques were told not to use the formula "May God have mercy upon Muʿāwiyah!" nor to say anything ⌜good⌝ about him.[245] [2165]

---

[239] Text: al-qaḍiyyah. Read al-ʿaṣabiyyah "the unchecked partisan spirit leading to conspiracy against the government and dissension among the contending groups." Al-ʿaṣabiyyah appears in all the sources including manuscripts R and C. Al-qaḍiyyah—in the sense of "going to court (?)"— is dubious in any case. The following remark about "testimony" perhaps means making demarches to the authorities.

[240] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 2, suggests: "and not to testify."

[241] The streets served as gathering places for the audiences of storytellers (quṣṣāṣ). See also text above, III, 2131. R has "road" in the singular.

[242] Text: jāmiʿayn; R: jānibayn "both sides (of Baghdad)," which has some support in al-ʿUyūn wa-al-ḥadāʾiq, ed. Dāwūd, I, 152, l. 3, ed. Saʿīdī, I, 87.

[243] That is, July 15.

[244] R again has "both sides," while Miskawayh, Tajārib, v, 3, has "on both sides and in the two Friday Mosques."

[245] We are told that ʿAbdallāh, the son of Aḥmad b. Ḥanbal, as a small child, heard servants in the mosque of al-Ruṣāfah offering people iced water to drink with the words, "Drink for the love of Muʿāwiyah b. Abī Sufyān!" See Zayyāt, "Tashayyuʿ."

People reported the rumor that the document cursing Muʿāwiyah, which al-Muʿtaḍid had ordered to be drafted, would be read from the pulpit after the Friday prayer. When they had performed the Friday prayer, they hastened to the prayer enclosure to hear the document read. However, it was not read.

Al-Muʿtaḍid had reportedly ordered that the document cursing Muʿāwiyah which had been drafted on orders of al-Maʾmūn be [2166] taken out of the archive for him, and this was done.[246] // A synopsis of it was used for preparing the copy of the following document drafted for al-Muʿtaḍid bi-llāh:[247]

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate

Praised be God, exalted, great, kind, wise,[248] powerful, and compassionate, Who stands alone in uniqueness, Who is resplendent[249] in His power, Who creates by His will and wisdom, Who knows the designs[250] of the breast and the secrets of the heart! Nothing seen is concealed from Him.[251] No speck of dust escapes Him in the heavens high above and the earths deep below.[252] "He knows everything,"[253] "has the Zayyāt quotes as his source Ibn al-Najjār's Dhayl of the History of Baghdad. It appears there in the biography of a certain ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. al-Kayyis [which is expected to be included in the forthcoming second volume of the Dhayl published in Hyderabad 1398ff. (1978ff.)]. I owe this reference to Glagow, 191, who discusses the possible significance of the story. It would seem that these activities in the mosques are indicative of the skill and financial capability of the pro-Umayyad faction that sponsored them, and if they continued to the time of al-Muʿtaḍid, they may explain his desire to do something about them (see below, n. 333).

---

246 For the likelihood of the existence of such a document, see Glagow, 187, and text above, III, 1098; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VII, 90-93, ed. Pellat, IV, 338f. See also Pellat, "Culte de Muʿāwiya," 53-66.

247 As stated above, n. 238, ʿUbaydallāh presumably did not draft the document himself. In his History of al-Muʿtaḍid, ʿUbaydallāh b. Aḥmad b. Abī Ṭāhir Ṭayfūr states that Aḥmad b. al-Ṭayyib al-Sarakhsī was connected with the drafting of the document. See Rosenthal, Sarakhsī, 53. A complete annotated translation of the document may be found in Glagow, 166-80.

248 R: "great, noble, kind."

249 R: al-qāhir "overwhelming."

250 R: sarāʾir "secrets," similar, it seems, to the reading al-asrār in C.

251 See Qur. 69:18. The allusions to Qurʾānic phraseology are more extensive than is indicated here in the notes.

252 See Qur. 34:22.

253 Qur. 65:12.

number of everything,"[254] and has set a term for everything. He is "all-knowing and all-informed."[255]

Praised be God Who has produced His creatures for the purpose of worshiping Him and has created His servants for the purpose of knowing Him on the basis of His previous knowledge of who will obey Him, and of his past command about who will disobey Him! Thus He had made it clear what they could attempt and what they were to fear. He has laid out for them the ways of salvation and warned them against the paths of perdition. He put proof behind them and excuse in front of them.[256] He chose for them His religion ⌜which He approved for them and⌝ with which He honored them. He has made those who seek their support and strength in Him His loyal and obedient friends and those who turn away from Him and oppose Him His disloyal and sinful enemies, "so that those who perish perish on the basis of clear evidence, and those who live live on the basis of clear evidence. God hears and knows."[257]

Praised be God Who singled out His Messenger Muḥammad from all creatures. He chose him to bring His message and sent him with right guidance and the approved religion to all His servants. He revealed the // clear and distinct [2167] Book to him and announced to him victory and success. He strengthened him with might and firm[258] evidence. He thus guided through him those whom He guided, saved from blindness those who responded to him, and led astray "anyone who turns backward."[259] Eventually God made his position manifest and his victory mighty. He subdued those who opposed him. He fulfilled His promise to him, made him the seal of His messengers, and had him die as the transmitter of His command, the conveyor of His message and the advisor of His community, accepted and guided to

---

[254] Qur. 72:28.

[255] Qur. 66:3. R substitutes "all-wise" for "all informed," thus quoting Qur. 66:2.

[256] In keeping with the Qur'ānic usage of ḥujjah and maʿdhirah, this, I believe, means that Muslims have proof of the divine truth to back them up and must defend it in order to have an excuse in the case of failure.

[257] Qur. 8:42.

[258] R: al-mubīn "clear."

[259] Qur. 70:17.

the noblest point of return for those who turn back (to Paradise),[260] and the highest station of His prophets who were sent as messengers, and of His blessed servants. God's best and most perfect, greatest and mightiest, most sincere and purest prayer upon him and upon his good family!

Praised be God Who made the Commander of the Faithful and his rightly guided and directed forebears the heirs of the Seal of the prophets and Lord of the messengers! He has put them in charge of the religion of Islam, charged them with setting straight God's believing servants, and entrusted them with the preservation of the pledges of wisdom and the heritage of prophethood. He has made them vicegerents in the community and helped them with might and protection, inspired support and superiority, until God gives victory to His religion over all others, even though the polytheists disapprove.

The Commander of the Faithful has learned that a number of ordinary people have been beset by doubt in their religious beliefs and have been affected by corruption in their faith. Their religious views[261] have become dominated by a bias which they express verbally without any knowledge and reflection, and with respect to which they follow false leaders without evidence and insight and set innovative religious views against established rules. God says: "Who is in greater error than he who follows his desire[262] without right guidance from God? Indeed, God does not guide aright [2168] people who do wrong."[263] // In doing so, they have left the community and rushed headlong into rebellion. They prefer discord and break up the Muslim cause. They show open friendship for one[264] whom God cut off from friendship, severed from divine protection, drove out of the religious community, and made it necessary to curse. They declare

---

260 R: al-muttaqīn "those who fear God."

261 Ahwā' "desires" lead away from true belief to sectarian views.

262 See the preceding note.

263 Qur. 28:50.

264 It is not always clear whether the singular or the plural is intended. The reference here is to Mu'āwiyah rather than the Umayyads in general. The ambiguity serves the purpose of suggesting that there is no real distinction between the individual and the group.

reverence for "the accursed tree,"[265] the Umayyads whose right God has diminished, whose position He has weakened, and whose support He has softened. They thereby oppose one[266] from the people of the house of blessing and mercy[267] through whom God has saved them from perdition and showered them with favors. God says: "He singles out for His mercy whomever He wishes. God possesses great excellence."[268]

The Commander of the Faithful takes a very serious view of what he has learned. He considers a failure to express his disapproval as harmful to himself regarding the religion of Islam, as detrimental to the Muslims whose affairs God has entrusted to him, and as a neglect of the duty imposed upon him by God to set straight opponents, inform the ignorant, establish proofs against doubters, and control the obstinate.

The Commander of the Faithful refers you, good people, to the fact that when God sent Muḥammad with His religion and ordered him to come forth with His command, Muḥammad began with his own family and tribe. He called them to his Lord, warned them and gave them glad tidings, advised them and guided them. Those who responded to him, believed what he said, and followed his command were a few persons from his own immediate family. Some of them believed in the message he brought from his Lord, while others supported him, even if they did not follow his religion, because they thought highly of him and had compassion for him. This happened because of God's past knowledge of those of them whom He chose and whom it was His will to invest with His vicegerency. He educated his family, and there were those of them who were believers eager to fight [265] Qur. 17:60. See also below, nn. 277 and 283, and text above, III, 706. Ṭabarī's Tafsīr, XV, 73f., as well as other Qur'ān commentaries such Ibn Kathīr, Tafsīr, IV, 323f., makes no reference whatever to the Umayyads in connection with this verse. It deserves notice that Ṭabarī rejected all these Qur'ānic interpretations given here. If he had been asked (and he was, after all, famous for his Qur'ānic commentary published many years earlier), he would, as a scholar, have had to contest vigorously most of the interpretations offered here. This would not have endeared him to the government.

---

[266] See above, n. 264. Here the allusion is to the Prophet and the ʿAbbāsids.

[267] R: al-ḥikmah "wisdom."

[268] Qur. 3:74.

vigorously, and those who were unbelievers eagerly giving [2169] him zealous support.[269] They repelled / / those who thwarted him, and subdued those who were hostile to him[270] and opposed him. They secured for him those who assisted and supported him, and asked those who generously aided him to give allegiance to him. They acted as spies for him among his enemies and intrigued for him in secret as well as in the open.[271] Eventually, the goal was reached and the time of right guidance arrived. Then they accepted the religion of God and obedience to Him, while believing in his Messenger and having faith in him with the most assured insight and the best guidance and desire. As a consequence, God made them the people of the house of mercy and the people of the house of the religion of Islam, whom He has cleansed thoroughly of all filth. He has made them the mine of wisdom, the heirs of prophecy, and the proper place for the caliphate. He made virtue necessarily theirs and made loyalty to them incumbent upon all human beings.

The large majority of the Prophet's tribe rebelled against him. They were hostile to him, considered him a liar, and fought him. They met him with criticism and the accusation of being a liar. They went to him in order to ⌜harm and⌝ frighten him, manifested hostility toward him, and instituted warfare against him. They kept away from those who wished to join him and inflicted punishment upon those who followed him. His most hostile opponent among those people and the first among them in every war and conflict, who, whenever a banner was raised against Islam, was its master, leader, and chief in every locale where there was war—Badr, Uḥud, the Trench, and the Conquest of Mecca—was Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and his Umayyad partisans.[272]

---

[269] R: wa-addaba banīhi fa-mu'minuhum mujāhid bi-baṣīratihī wa-kāfir mujāhid bi-nuṣratihī wa-ḥamīyatihī. See also Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCVIII.

[270] Text: wa-yanharūna man ʿārahū "repelled those who injured him" (?). Read as in R: wa-yaqharūna (also in BC) man ʿādāhu.

[271] Glagow, 170, n. 1, cites as an example the report in Wāqidī, Maghāzī, I, 203 f., that al-ʿAbbās informed the Prophet about the expedition that led to the battle of Uḥud.

[272] That is, the Umayyad Shīʿah. Abū Sufyān died at a very advanced age about the year 32 (652).

They were cursed in the Book of God and then by the Prophet expressly in a number of places and passages, because of God's past knowledge of their position, their hypocrisy, and their unbelieving masterminds.[273] Abū Sufyān fought eagerly, resisted vehemently, and continued acting hostile, // until he was subdued by the sword and God's [2170] cause was triumphant to their displeasure.[274] He professed Islam without caring for it, concealing unbelief that he did not give up. The Messenger of God as well as the Muslims knew him to be such a person and clarified[275] for him the category of "those whose hearts are won,"[276] and thus accepted him and his children in full knowledge (of their worthlessness).

The statement in which God cursed the Umayyads through His Prophet orally and by way of revealed scripture is: "... The tree accursed in the Qur'ān. We shall frighten them, but it only greatly increases their rebelliousness."[277] Nobody denies that the Umayyads are meant here.

Then there is the statement of the Messenger when he saw Abū Sufyān coming upon a donkey,[278] with Mu'āwiyah and his son Yazīd[279] driving it: "May God curse the leader, the rider, and the driver!"

There is also the statement of Abū Sufyān reported by the transmitters: "O Banū 'Abd Manāf, catch it like a ball, for there is no Paradise or Hell."[280] This is pure unbelief. On [273] In connection with "masterminds" (aḥlām), a footnote in the Leiden edition of the text refers to Qur. 52:32, where aḥlām is explained as 'uqūl with reference to the Qurayshite leaders. See the commentaries such as Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XXVII, 17f., or Ibn al-Jawzī, Zād, VIII, 54.

---

[274] See Qur. 9:48.

[275] RC: bayyana.

[276] Qur. 9:60. The expression, which the commentators apparently no longer understood fully, was taken to refer to a mixed bag of Muslims and non-Muslims, among them, in the first place, Abū Sufyān, See, for instance, Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, X, 98f.

[277] Qur. 17:60 (see above, n. 265).

[278] R: rākiban "riding" (for "upon a donkey").

[279] Arabic syntax strongly suggests that the Yazīd meant here is the son of Mu'āwiyah, although Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah was born long after the Prophet's death. The well-known son of Abū Sufyān, Yazīd al-Khayr, seems totally out of place in this context. He appears often together with his father Abū Sufyān, and this may somehow have produced the story mentioned here. The possibility that the son of Mu'āwiyah was meant here with little regard for history, cannot be completely ruled out. The solution to the problem depends on locating further references to the story.

[280] "It" refers to this world or to rulership. See Glagow, 171.

account of it, God's curse will befall him as it did "the Israelites who were unbelievers through the mouth of David and ʿĪsā b. Maryam. That is because they were sinners and transgressors."[281]

There is also the reported fact that Abū Sufyān, after he had gone blind, stood at the mountain road of Uḥud and said to his guide, "Here we trampled upon Muḥammad and his companions."[282]

There is also the dream seen by the Prophet which worried him so much that he was never seen laughing afterwards. God revealed: "We have made the dream which we have let you see but a temptation for the people."[283] In his dream, he reportedly saw some Umayyads jumping on his pulpit.[284]

Then there is the fact that the Messenger of God banished [2171] // al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ because he imitated him. By virtue of the Prophet's prayer, God made al-Ḥakam a lasting sign, for when the Prophet saw him making his contortions, he said to him, "Be as you are!," and he remained that way for the rest of his life.[285]

And so it went (with the Umayyads), until Marwān later started the first civil war that happened in Islam and became responsible for all the forbidden blood that was shed during it or spilled afterwards.[286]

---

281 Qur. 5:78.

282 Read dusnā, as in R, no doubt the correct reading. Abū Sufyān lost one eye at al-Ṭā'if, and the other in the battle of the Yarmūk. See Dhahabī, Ta'rīkh, II, 97, sub anno 31.

283 This is the beginning of the verse on the "accursed tree," Qur. 17:60. In the commentaries, the dream is reported as being concerned with people on pulpits, but not necessarily the Umayyads. See, for instance, Ibn al-Jawzī, Zād, V, 54.

284 "Like monkeys," as one report has it. See Dhahabī, Ta'rīkh, II, 96; Maqrīzī, Nizāʿ, trans. Bosworth, 76.

285 According to Balādhurī, Ansāb, ed. Iḥsān ʿAbbās, IV, 513f., al-Ḥakam, a cousin of Abū Sufyān and the father of the later Caliph Marwān, distorted his nose and mouth in order to ridicule the Prophet. Elsewhere, it is said that he imitated the manner in which the Prophet swayed in walking. See Dhahabī, Ta'rīkh, II, 95ff.; idem, ʿIbar, I, 32; Maqrīzī, Nizāʿ, trans. Bosworth, 52f.; Glagow, 172, n. 4.

286 The reference is to the civil war with ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr.

There is also the statement in the sūrah "al-Qadr" revealed by God to His Prophet: "The night of destiny is better than a thousand months"—of Umayyad rule.[287]

There is also the report that the Messenger of God called for Muʿāwiyah to take dictation, but Muʿāwiyah refused to do so, because he was eating. The Prophet then said, "May God never sate his stomach!" As a result, Muʿāwiyah was always hungry and said, "By God, I do not stop eating because I have enough, but because I am unable (to eat any longer.)"[288]

There is also the report that the Messenger of God said, "From this mountain pass, a man from my community is coming up who will be resurrected separate from my religious group." It was Muʿāwiyah who was coming up.[289]

There is also the report that the Messenger of God said, "When you see Muʿāwiyah on my pulpit, kill him!"[290]

Then there is the famous ḥadīth traced to the Prophet who said, "Muʿāwiyah is in a casket of fire in the lowest layer of Hell, calling out: 'O Clement One, O Generous One!' He is given the answer: 'Now (you believe), but before you sinned and caused corruption.' "[291]

---

[287] Qur. 97:3. The ninety years of Umayyad rule corresponded to about a thousand months. This coincidence was reportedly already figured out by the ḥadīth scholar al-Qāsim b. al-Faḍl [d. 167 (783-4)]. He transmitted a statement made to al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib to the effect that the Prophet dreamed of the Umayyads upon his pulpit in a succession of caliphs; it brought about the revelation of *sūrah*s 108 and 97, in order to dispel the great worry the dream caused the Prophet. See Ṭabarī, Tafsīr, XXX, 143. For Ṭabarī, all this was worthless speculation. Understandably, later scholars found it fascinating. Ibn Kathīr, Tafsīr, VII, 331f., begins his commentary on Qur. 97:3 with a heated refutation of it. He also quotes the obvious observation that it would not mean anything if Umayyad rule was inferior to the Night of al-Qadr. This was only to be expected, since the Night of al-Qadr is something so incomparably great and wonderful. See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, VI, 51f., ed. Pellat, IV, 74.

[288] For Muʿāwiyah as a secretary of the Prophet, see, for example, Dhahabī, Taʾrīkh, II, 318. Glagow, 173, n. 1, refers to Muslim's Ṣaḥīḥ (see Concordance, III, 59b64). The Prophet sent ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās, who was playing with his playmates, to call Muʿāwiyah. ʿAbdallāh came back twice to say that Muʿāwiyah was eating (and not willing to come). In his revaluation of the relationship between the Prophet and Abū Sufyān, Kister, "Muḍar," 265, refers briefly to Muʿāwiyah's appointment as secretary.

[289] I have found no parallel to this report so far.

[290] See Dhahabī, Taʾrīkh, II, 231.

[291] Qur. 10:91. The addition of fa-yujābu in R has no doubt preserved Ṭabarī's original text. See also Rosenthal, Sarakhsī, 53.

There is also his going to war against the most outstanding, oldest, and most famous of Muslims, ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. With his false claim, Muʿāwiyah contested ʿAlī's rightful claim. He fought ʿAlī's helpers with his own erring scoun-[2172] drels. He attempted what he and his father never ceased // attempting, namely, to "extinguish the light of God" and deny God's religion, but "God has no other wish but to make His light perfect, even though the polytheists disapprove."[292] Muʿāwiyah tried to seduce foolish men and confuse the ignorant with his trickery and injustice. The Messenger of God had mentioned the story of the two[293] earlier when he said to ʿAmmār, "The unjust party will kill you. You call them to Paradise while they call you to the Fire."[294] Muʿāwiyah preferred this fleeting world and denied the lasting other world. He left the ties of Islam and declared forbidden blood permissible to be shed, until in his rebellion and on behalf of his deviation, the blood of an uncountable number of the best Muslims was shed, those who were defending the religion of God and supporting His right. He fought against God and strove that God be disobeyed and not obeyed, that His laws be invalidated and not upheld, that His religion be opposed and not practiced, and that the word of deviation triumph and the call of falsehood be raised. But "God's word is the highest."[295] His religion is victorious. His wisdom is followed and is effective. His command is powerful, and the trickery of those who work against Him is defeated and voided. Muʿāwiyah eventually had to shoulder the burden of those wars and their consequences and to take the responsibility for the blood spilled then and the blood spilled afterwards. He followed the ways

---

[292] Qur. 9:32, which has "unbelievers." "Polytheists" is found in 9:33.

[293] That is, ʿAlī and Muʿāwiyah.

[294] ʿAmmār b. Yāsir died, supposedly ninety- three years old, at Ṣiffīn in 37 (957). See Dhahabī, Taʾrīkh, II, 176-82. It was much debated whether the two sentences quoted here really belonged together. See Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, II, 88f. (Concordance, I, 203a29-32). The two sentences together as here but in the third person appear in Dhahabī, Taʾrīkh, II, 179f. In R, the first sentence uses the second person, and the second sentence the third person. See, further, Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, I, 338, trans. Guillaume, 299 (the second sentence only).

[295] Qur. 9:40.

of corruption. The resulting guilt, as well as the guilt of those who practice that corruption, will be upon him to ⌜the Day of Resurrection⌝. He declared forbidden matters permissible and deprived people of their rights. He was deceived by (God's) forbearance and cheated by (His) delaying, but God lies in wait for him.[296]

God made it necessary to curse him for killing, while they could offer no resistance, the best of the men around Muḥammad and the men of the second generation and excellent and religious people, such as ʿAmr b. al-Ḥamiq and Ḥujr b. ʿAdī[297] and their like. His intention was to gain might, royalty, and power. However, might, royalty, and power belong to God. God / / says: "He who kills a believer intentionally will have Hell as his reward and remain in it eternally. God is angry at him and has cursed him and has prepared a severe punishment for him."[298] [2173]

He also deserved God's curse and that of His Messenger by claiming (Abū Sufyān's paternity) for Ziyād b. Sumayyah[299] in defiance of God, for God says: "Call them after their fathers! This is most fair in the eyes of God."[300] The Messenger of God says: "Accursed is he who claims paternity other than that of his father or aligns himself with others than his masters."[301] He also says: "The child belongs to the bed, and 296 See Qur. 89:14.

---

297 Of these two ʿAlid partisans, Ḥujr was the more important. He appears in all the histories of the period and all reference works. See also Balādhurī, Ansāb, ed. Kister, IVA, 211-36, ed. Iḥsān ʿAbbās, IV, 1, 242-71; for ʿAmr, see op. cit., ed. Kister, 236f., ed. ʿAbbās, 242f. ʿAmr was on Ḥujr's staff. He was killed in 50 (670), or 51 (see text above, II, 118ff.). The date of 51 (671) apparently goes back to Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Ṭabaqāt, ed. ʿUmarī, 107, 136, ed. Zakkār, I, 235, 306. However, in his Taʾrīkh, 197, Khalīfah places ʿAmr's death in the year 50. See, further, Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, 1173f.; Dhahabī, Taʾrīkh, II, 234 f.; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 23f. Since decapitating defeated enemies and sending the severed heads to the caliph as proof of their death is mentioned so much here, it may be noted that ʿAmr's head was supposedly the first in Islam to be sent from one place to another (a detail apparently passed over in silence by Ṭabarī).

298 Qur. 4:93.

299 Ziyād's father supposedly was a certain ʿUbayd. Sumayyah was the name of his mother. The famous istilḥāq of Ziyād b. Muʿāwiyah took place in 44 (664-5), see text above, II, 69f. Ziyād died in 53 (673). On the ʿAbbāsid attitude toward him, see also text above, III, 477ff.

300 Qur. 33:5.

301 This is not one of the traditions to be found in the canonical collections.

to the fornicator the stone."[302] Muʿāwiyah openly opposed the law of God and the practice of His Prophet by making the child not belonging to the bed and the fornicator not being harmed by his fornication. By thus making a claim for something forbidden by God and His Messenger, he exposed the Prophet's wife Umm Ḥabībah[303] and others to shame[304] forbidden by God, establishing a relationship ruled out by God and thus opening up a source of defect and alteration for the religion of Islam without equal, which was outlawed by God.[305]

Furthermore, there is Muʿāwiyah's disdainful attitude toward the religion of God, manifested by his calling God's servants to (acknowledge the succession of) his son Yazīd, that arrogant drunken sot, that owner of cocks, cheetahs, and monkeys.[306] With furious threats and frightful intimidation, he forced the best of Muslims to give the oath of allegiance to Yazīd, although he was aware of Yazīd's stupidity and was acquainted with his ugliness and viciousness. He had occasion to observe with his own eyes his drunkenness, immorality, and unbelief. In disobedience to God and His Messenger, Muʿāwiyah had paved the way for Yazīd to take over, and when Yazīd was firmly in control, he sought revenge and retaliation for the polytheists against the Mus-

---

[302] One of the most quoted and discussed traditions, the second part of which has not yet been satisfactorily explained. See Concordance, I, 425b.

[303] Umm Ḥabībah supposedly died in the year of the istilḥāq or before that event. She was a daughter of Abū Sufyān. We are told that she resented the introduction of a stranger, possibly a bastard, into the family and, above all, the intimation that her father was an adulterer, so much so that she refused to receive Ziyād. A natural brother of Ziyād is also said to have been bitter in his resentment. See Ibn ʿAbd al-Barr, Istīʿāb, 526. This picture of the event is approximately the one reflected in al-Muʿtaḍid's document. The true historical situation may have been quite different.

[304] "Shame" (lit. "unveiling of faces") does not apear in RC.

[305] On the ʿAbbāsid attitude, see also text above, III, 477ff.

[306] The cocks were for cock fights, the cheetahs for hunting (see EI², s. v. fahd), and the monkeys for amusement (see EI², s.v. ḳird). No characterization of this sort is found in B, and R has merely "that accursed, filthy person" (al-laʿīn al-rijs). It is difficult to decide what the original reading of the document may have been. It could have been Ṭabarī, or perhaps someone else involved in the transmission of his work, who did some editorial work here, considering one of the readings more suitable as a defamation of Yazīd than the other.

lims. He forced the men of the Ḥarrah[307] to fight a battle more loathsome than any in the history of Islam // and more evil than any with respect to crimes committed against good men,[308]* crimes consisting of bloodshed and the violation of women and property. He then permitted al-Madīnah to be plundered for three days.* He thereby quenched his raging anger. He thought that he had taken revenge on the friends of God and achieved his intention[309] with respect to the enemies of God. He publicly announced and manifested his unbelief and polytheism in the following verses:[310] [2174]

(1) Would that my elders (who fought and died) at Badr had witnessed (At Uḥud) the lack of steadfastness of the Khazraj when the spears fell.
(2) We have now killed their leading[311] lords
And successfully adjusted the inequality of Badr.[312]
(3) They would have broken into shouts of joy,
And then they would have said, "O Yazīd, don't ask!"[313]

---

[307] See EI², s. v. Ḥarra; M. J. Kister, "Ḥarra."

[308] The text suggests rather "on the part of good men" (?).

[309] R: al-tha'r, another word for "revenge."

[310] According to the reports on Yazīd's scandalous behavior, he quoted on this occasion verses by ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zibaʿrā celebrating the Muslim defeat at Uḥud. For Ibn al-Zibaʿrā, see EI², s. v. Ibn al-Zibaʿrā; Sezgin, GAS, II, 275f. The first two verses were taken from his poem. See the study of him by Minganti, 354, 340 (n. 2), no. XIII. Among the various authors who cite the poem in this connection are al-Jāḥiẓ, Nābitah, in Rasā'il al-Jāḥiẓ, ed. Hārūn, II, 14f. (verses 1, 3, 2); Ibn ʿAbd Rabbih, ʿIqd, IV, 390 (1, 3), V, 86 (1), VI, 153 (1); text above, III, 436 (1, 2); al-Bīrūnī, Chronology, 331, trans., 328; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 236 (1).

The sequence of the verses in R is 1, 3, 2; B has only verses 1 and 3. Verses 4 and 5 are missing in RB and were added in C in the margin. Thus, they are unlikely to have been part of Ṭabarī's original text and were probably added by someone familiar with and fond of the poem.

[311] The readings differ considerably. Ibn al-Zibaʿrā: al-ḍiʿf "twice as many"; al-Jāḥiẓ: al-ghurr; al-Bīrūnī: al-qarn; Dīwān Ḥassān b. Thābit, ed. ʿArafat, I, 68: al-qarm; text above, III, 436: al-ḍiʿf. The text of the Leiden edition (al-qarm) seems to be Ṭabarī's original reading in this passage. Al-qawm "people" in the Cairo text may be a misprint. R has al-niṣf "half," apparently a corruption of al-ḍiʿf, a correction by someone of Ṭabarī's text on the basis of the original poem.

[312] See Qālī, Amālī, I, 140f.

[313] That is, everything is all right and needs no further probing.

(4) I shall not be a descendant of Khindif, if I do not take revenge
On the Banū Aḥmad for what he did.[314]
(5) The Hāshim coveted[315] royalty, although no
News had come and no revelation sent down.[316]

⌜This is straying from the religion of Islam.⌝[317] It is the statement of one who does not care for God, His religion, His Book, and His Messenger. It is the statement of one who does not believe in God and the revelation that has come from God.

Then there is the greatest and grossest turpitude committed by Yazīd: the shedding of the blood of al-Ḥusayn, the son of ʿAlī and the Prophet's daughter Fāṭimah. He slew al-Ḥusayn in spite of the Prophet's great esteem for him and his [2175] position as a man of religion and excellence / / and in spite of the testimony of the Prophet that he and his brother (al-Ḥasan) were the lords of the young men in Paradise.[318] Yazīd was motivated by defiance of God, non-belief in His religion, hostility toward His Messenger, aggression against the family of (the Prophet), and contempt for his dignity. It was as if his killing of al-Ḥusayn and the people of his house was no more than killing Turkish and Daylam unbelievers, so that he did not have to fear revenge from God or watch out for God striking back. But God cut short his life, eliminated him root and branch, deprived him of what he pos-

---

314 The woman named Khindif figured as a remote tribal ancestor in the genealogy of the Quraysh and the Umayyads. See Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, tables 1, 3, 4, and 8, also II, 347a. See also text above, II, 1929; Maqrīzī, Nizāʿ, trans. Bosworth, 55, 126. Aḥmad refers to the Prophet, and the Banū Aḥmad are the family of the Prophet, as is the Hāshim tribe of the following verse. This reference to the Hāshimites/ʿAbbāsids was naturally particularly galling for the ʿAbbāsid caliphs.

315 Text: la-ʿanat, understanding ʿ*anat* in the sense of ʿ*uniyat*, "were concerned with"; Nöldeke and van Vloten thought of laʿibat "played with." See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCCLXXXI, DCCXCVIII. Waliʿat, in the Cairo text, meaning "coveted," may be just a simplification, if not a freehand correction, but it represents a kind of neutral rendering of the intended meaning and was therefore adopted here; yet, laʿibat is perhaps the correct reading.

316 That is, the descendants of the Prophets were not indicated as the rulers of Islam by either tradition or the divine revelation of the Qur'ān.

317 This sentence is missing in R and was added by a later hand in C.

318 See Concordance, III, 57b36f.

sessed, and prepared him for the torture and punishment he deserved from God for his sin.

So it went, until the Marwānids changed the Book of God, invalidated His laws, and appropriated God's property and distributed it among themselves.They destroyed His house, declared permissible what God had forbidden[319], and set up mangonels to hurl fire upon it, burning and destroying it without letup. They violated His house, permitting all that God had declared forbidden, killing and harming those who took refuge in it, and frightening away those to whom God had given protection in it. Finally, when the word of punishment came true for them[320]—they truly deserved God's revenge, as they had filled the earth with injustice and hostility and had wronged and oppressed one and all of His servants—God allowed the family of His Prophet and his heirs whom He had destined for His vicegerency to mete out to them what He had allowed their ancestors and forebears, who believed and fought for the faith, to mete out to the early nonbelievers among them. Through them, God shed the blood of those apostates, just as through their forefathers He had shed the blood of the earlier unbelievers and polytheists. God eliminated the root of the wrongdoers. Praised be God, the Lord of the worlds! God gave power to those who had become weak and oppressed and returned // [2176] to the deserving people their rights, as Almighty God says: "And we want to show favor to those who became weak and oppressed on earth and make them leaders and make them heirs."[321]

Know, O people, that Almighty God has given commands for no other purpose than to be obeyed. He has set up examples to be imitated, pronounced judgements to be accepted, and made it obligatory to hold on to the tradition (sunnah) of the Prophet so that it may be followed. Indeed, [319] Istiḥlāl ḥarāmihī appears here to refer specifically to the desecration of the House. R: ḥaramihī "its sacred precinct" may be an incorrect simplification.

---

For the dramatic events of 64 (683), see text above, sub anno 64.

[320] See Qur. 39:19.

[321] Qur. 28:5.

many of those ignorant and wretched[322] people who go astray and then fold up and move on, belong to those whose "rabbis and monks have taken for themselves lords other than God,"[323] although Almighty God has said: "Fight the leaders of unbelief!"[324]

Good people! Get away from what makes God angry at you and turn to what makes Him pleased with you! Be satisfied with what God has chosen for you and adhere to what He has commanded you to do and refrain from what He has forbidden to you! Follow the straight path, the manifest road,[325] and the people of the house of mercy, through whom God guided you in the beginning and saved you from injustice and hostility in the end and through whose dynastic succession He has given you ease, safety, and might and in whose days He has provided for you success in your religious attitudes and in your livelihood! Curse whom God and His Messenger have cursed! Keep away from whom you must keep away, if you want to attain nearness to God!

O God! Curse Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb, his son, Muʿāwiyah, Muʿāwiyah's son Yazīd, and Marwān b. al-Ḥakam and his children!

O God! Curse the leaders of unbelief, the leaders of error, the enemies of the religion of Islam, those who fight against the Prophet, those who change the Laws, those who alter the Book, and those who shed forbidden blood!

O God! We say to You that we have nothing to do with [2177] befriending Your enemies // and winking at those who disobey You, as You say: "You will not find people who believe in God and the Last Day showing friendship to those who act against God and His Messenger."[326]

O people! Recognize the truth, and you will recognize those who are truthful. Consider the roads of error, and you will recognize those who travel them. For only their deeds

322 Read, as in R: wa-al-shaqā'. The text of the Leiden edition wa-al-safā'/h (?) (see also the Cairo text) seems to assume a dubious connection with the root sfh "stupid."
323 Qur. 9:31.
324 Qur. 9:12.
325 CB: "roads."
326 Qur. 58:22.

distinguish men, and only their forefathers[327] connect them to either error or righteousness. Thus let nobody's censure affect your attitude toward God! Let yourselves not be turned away from the religion of God by anybody's blandishments or anybody's trickery, or by loyalty[328] to those whose loyalty will lead you to disloyalty toward God!

O people! It is through us that God has guided you aright. We are the ones appointed to preserve God's concerns among you. We are the heirs of the Messenger of God and the ones who are in charge of the religion of God. Thus stay where we put you, and execute what we command you to do! For as long as you obey the vicegerents of God and leaders toward right guidance along the path of faith and the fear of God, you will be all right.[329] The Commander of the Faithful is the one who seeks God's protection for you, and he asks Him to give you success. He prays to God to lead you toward right guidance and to preserve your religion for you[330], until you meet Him with it, deserving His loyalty and enlisting His mercy.[331]

God suffices for the Commander of the Faithful as your (ruler). In Him he places his trust. He asks God for help in your affairs with which He has entrusted him. ⌜The Commander of the Faithful⌝ has no power and strength except through God.

And peace be upon you!
Written by Abū al-Qāsim ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān in the year 284/897.

ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān reportedly called in the qādī Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb and ordered him to try everything possible to get al-Muʿtaḍid to give up his plan. Yūsuf went to al-Muʿtaḍid and talked to him // about it, saying, "O Commander of the Faithful! I fear that the [2178]

327 R: āthāruhum "their accomplishments."
328 R: wa-jānibū ṭāʿata "and avoid loyalty."
329 R (also C ?) adds wa before the following amīr, justifying the translation given.
330 Read, with RC: dīnikum ʿalaykum.
331 R: "deserving His mercy through loyalty to Him."

populace will be disturbed and that, when they hear this document, a commotion will take place." Al-Muʿtaḍid replied that if there was a commotion among the populace or if they expressed (opposition by gossip and rumors), he would use force against them. Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb then asked him in effect what he would do with the Ṭālibids who were ready everywhere to rebel and who were favored by many because of their relationship to the Messenger and their inherited authority.[332] For them this document meant praise. It would make people, when they heard it, still more favorably disposed toward them and make them talk about them and become more and more convinced (of the righteousness of their cause) than they are already. Al-Muʿtaḍid remained silent and made no reply. Afterwards, he gave no more orders with respect to the document.[333]

On Friday, Rajab 16, 284 (Friday, August 19, 897), Jaʿfar b. Baghlaghaz[334] went to ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār, who was in Naysābūr, with robes of honor, a standard signifying ʿAmr's rank as governor of al-Rayy, and presents from al-Muʿtaḍid.

In this year, Bakr b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf joined Muḥammad b. Zayd al-ʿAlawī in Ṭabaristān. Badr and ʿUbaydallāh stayed in al-Jabal waiting to see how Bakr's situation would develop[335] and trying to improve conditions in the province.

---

[332] See Nöldeke, Belegwörterbuch, 7b.

[333] The meaning of the intended action by al-Muʿtaḍid has been much discussed, see Glagow, 165-201. It must have been clear to the Caliph that, in effect, anti-Umayyad feeling went hand in hand with pro-ʿAlid sentiments and that the ʿAlid movement was more powerful and dangerous than any pro-Umayyad activities. Those activities, however, may have offended ʿAbbāsid pride so greatly that al-Muʿtaḍid threw caution to the wind and felt that he had to restate the ʿAbbāsid cause without regard to the possible political repercussions. See also above, n. 245.

On attitudes toward the Umayyads in the ruling circles of the times, a different point of view is provided by Bellamy, "Pro-Umayyad propaganda." For a brief analysis of the event, see Sourdel, "Appels," 124f.

[334] See text above, III, 1987.

[335] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 4, anticipates here the news of Bakr's death in the following year.

In this year, Qurrah,[336] which is in Byzantine territory, was reportedly conquered by Rāghib, the mawlā of al-Muwaffaq, and Ibn Kallūb.[337] This was on Friday, Rajab...[338]

During the night of Tuesday, Shaʿbān 12, 284 (Wednesday, September 14, 897)—or, as reported (from another source), during Wednesday night — a specter like a human being with a sword in his hand appeared in al-Muʿtaḍid's Thurayyā palace. One of the eunuchs went after the specter to see what[339] it was. The specter struck him // with a blow of the sword, cutting his belt and [2179] making contact with the eunuch's body. The eunuch turned away from the specter and fled as it entered a sown plot in the garden and hid there. The specter was sought all night and the next morning, but no trace of it was found.

Al-Muʿtaḍid was worried about it. People hazarded many a guess about what it was, even saying that it was one of the jinn. The specter continued to appear later on many occasions. Al-Muʿtaḍid went so far as to put persons in charge of the wall of the palace. He had it ⌜and its top⌝ put in good shape and placed a protective railing[340] on it, so that scaling hooks[341] thrown upon it would not fall upon it (and catch hold). Burglars were brought from prison, and the matter was discussed with them. They were asked whether anyone would be able to enter through a hole or by scaling the wall.[342]

On Saturday, Shaʿbān 22, 284 (Saturday, September 24, 897), Karāmah b. Murr[343] sent people in fetters from al-Kūfah, report-

---

336 Greek Koron. See Honigmann, Ostgrenze, 45. For the passage, see Canard, Sources arabes, 13.

337 I have not succeeded in obtaining further information about him.

338 The date is left incomplete. R: "on a Friday in Rajab."

339 Text: mā; RB: man "who."

340 See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CXXX. The reading barābikh is confirmed by R. "Pipes" or "tubing" may be a more exact rendering. It was intended to make it impossible for a hook at the end of a rope to be thrown upon the wall and by securing the rope enable a person to scale the wall.

341 R has the plural kalālīb.

342 Masʿūdī's report, in Murūj, VIII, 181f., ed. Pellat, V, 161f., is much less precise but dwells on the various disguises of the specter.

343 No further information about this individual seems available. The reading Murr does not appear to be well established here.

edly Qarmaṭians. They confessed that Abū Hāshim b. Ṣadaqah al-Kātib[344] was in correspondence with them and that he was one of their leaders. Abū Hāshim was arrested, put in fetters, and incarcerated in the dungeons.[345]

On Saturday, Ramaḍān 7, 284 (Saturday, October 8, 897), lunatics and exorcists were assembled and brought to al-Muʿtaḍid's Thurayyā palace, because of the specter that was appearing to him. When they were brought in, al-Muʿtaḍid went up to a chamber on the upper floor and observed them. While he was looking at them, an insane woman had an epileptic fit, became disturbed, and uncovered herself. Al-Muʿtaḍid turned away from them in disgust. Reportedly, he had five dirhams given to each of them, following which they were sent back. Before he observed [2180] them, he had sent / / someone to ask the exorcists whether it was possible for them to find out about the specter that had appeared to him. One of them mentioned that they might cast a spell upon one of the lunatics and, when he fell down, ask the jinnī what the specter was. However, when al-Muʿtaḍid saw the woman have the epileptic fit, he ordered them sent home.[346]

---

[344] As a suspected inside agent of the Qarmaṭians, this obscure government official (kātib) was naturally deemed very dangerous.

[345] No doubt, the dungeons that had been constructed by al-Muʿtaḍid and were demolished by al-Muktafī when he came to power (see text below, 2208).

[346] Al-Muʿtaḍid, usually described as cruel and brave, appears here as sensitive and fearful of the unknown. This fear may have been based upon very realistic security considerations as well as the danger resulting from rumors circulating widely among the population. Interest in the mystery lasted well into the reign of al-Muqtadir, when the alleged solution came to light. See Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 172; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, XI, 77; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III 114. In the words of Ibn Taghrībirdī: "It was a eunuch who was attracted to one of the slave girls in the residences. Now it was al-Muʿtaḍid's custom to forbid eunuchs when they reached puberty to enter the harem. Outside the residences of the harem, there was a large garden. The eunuch used a white beard. Sometimes he appeared in the form of a monk, and sometimes in a soldier's dress with a sword in his hand. He used a number of beards of different shapes and colors. When he appeared, the slave girl came out with the other slave girls in order to see him, and he would be alone with her among the trees. Whenever a search was made for him, he entered among the trees, took off beard, hood, and so on, hid them, but left the sword unsheathed in his hand to give the impression that he was one of those searching for the specter. Eventually, after al-Muqtadir became caliph and the eunuch was sent out to Ṭarsūs (Ibn al-Jawzī: Ṭūs?), the slave girl revealed his story."

In Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 284 (November 30-December 29, 897), news arrived at Baghdad from Iṣbahān that al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf, who was known as Abū Laylā,[347] had attacked and killed the eunuch Shafīʿ,[348] who had charge of him. Al-Ḥārith's brother, ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf, had seized Abū Laylā. He then put him in fetters and took him to a fortress belonging to the family of Abū Dulaf in al-Zazz[349] and detained him there. All property, valuable furnishings, and jewels belonging to the family of Abū Dulaf were in the fortress. Their mawlā Shafīʿ was in charge of guarding it, as well as the fortress itself, together with a number of ʿUmar's pages and intimates. When ʿUmar sought a guarantee of safe-conduct from the central government and Bakr rebelled against them and fled,[350] the fortress with all it contained remained in the hands of Shafīʿ. Abū Laylā talked to Shafīʿ about releasing him, but he refused, saying that he would do nothing with him or anything he controlled except that which ʿUmar would order him to do.

A slave girl[351] of Abū Laylā reportedly told the following story: A little page was in prison with Abū Laylā to serve him, and another page was there who would go to and from prison to serve Abū Laylā's needs, but he did not spend the night with him as the little page did. Abū Laylā asked the page who went out to serve his needs, to find a way to smuggle a file in. This the page did, by bringing it in with some of Abū Laylā's food. The eunuch Shafīʿ, when he was ready to go to sleep, used to come every night to see Abū Laylā in his apartment. Then Shafīʿ would lock / / the [2181] door ⌜of the apartment⌝ with his own hand and go to sleep, with an unsheathed sword under his bed. Now Abū Laylā asked for a slave girl to be brought to him, and a young slave girl was brought in. It is from this slave girl that Dalfāʾ, the slave girl of Abū Laylā, got this report: Abū Laylā filed through the pin of the fetter, until he was able to get it off his feet whenever he wanted.

---

[347] See text above, III, 2122.

[348] Probably not identical with one of the eunuchs of the same name mentioned in the sources, as, for instance, in the text above, III, 1459, 1684.

[349] This reading, suggested in Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCVIII, appears clearly in Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 4. R: "al-Rayy," is clearly a mistake. For al-Zazz, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 929f.

[350] See text above, III, 2154f.

[351] Probably Dalfāʾ who is mentioned later on.

She continued: One evening, ⌜the eunuch⌝ Shafīʿ came to Abū Laylā and sat down to talk to him. Abū Laylā asked him to have a few cups with him, and he did so.The eunuch then got up to relieve himself.[352] She continued: Abū Laylā ordered me to make up his bed. He put clothing in the place where a man would ordinarily lie in the bed, and covered it with sheets. He ordered me to sit at the foot of the bed and said, "When Shafīʿ comes to look after me and lock the door and asks you about me, say, 'He is asleep.' " Abū Laylā left the room and hid amid bedding and furnishings in a recessed alcove at the door of the apartment. Shafīʿ came, looked at the bed, and asked the slave girl about Abū Laylā. She told him that he was already asleep, and he locked the door. When the eunuch and those with him were asleep in the house at the fortress, Abū Laylā went out, took the sword from underneath Shafīʿ's bed, and attacked and killed him.

The pages who were asleep around him jumped up frightened. Abū Laylā extricated himself from them, with the sword in his hand, and said to them, "I am Abū Laylā. I have just killed Shafīʿ. You are safe, but I shall kill anyone of you who advances toward me." They opened the gate of the fortress and went out. He went [2182] to seat himself / / at the gate of the fortress. Some people in the fortress gathered. He talked to them, and promised to treat them well and placed them under oath. In the morning, he went down from the fortress, sent for the Kurds and the native Kurdish inhabitants.[353] Bringing them together, he gave them gifts. He then went out against the central authorities. His killing of the eunuch reportedly took place on the night of Saturday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 18, 284 (Saturday, December 17, 897).

According to another version, he slaughtered the eunuch with a knife his page had brought in to him, and he then took the sword from underneath the eunuch's bed and confronted the pages with it.

---

[352] Lit., "to take care of his needs."

[353] For zumūm, see Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, trans. Rosenthal, I, 135, n. 130. The distinction between "Kurds" and ahl al-zumūm may refer, in a way, to soldiers and civilians, but this is not certain. V. Minorsky suggested reading rumūm for zumūm; see *EI*², s. v. Kurds, Kurdistān (IV, 450b).

In this year, that is, 284 (897), the astrologers threatened the people by predicting that most climes of the earth would be flooded and that only a small section of the clime of Babylonia would be safe. This would result from a heavy rainfall and rising water in rivers, springs, and wells. It was, however, a rainless year. People saw little rain, and the water in rivers, springs, and wells dwindled to such a degree that people had to pray for rain. They prayed for rain in Baghdad several [354] times. God proved false the story, the trickery, and the deception of the astrologers as well as the trickery of those who believed them.[355]

On a Thursday, on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 29, 284 (Thursday, January 26, 898), a battle reportedly took place between ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī and Abū Laylā b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf two *farsakh*s (twelve km) from Iṣbahān. An arrow reportedly hit Abū Laylā, piercing his throat. [356] He fell from his horse, and his men fled. His head was taken and brought to Iṣbahān.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Dāwūd al-Hāshimī, who was known as Utrujjah.[357] / / [2183]

[354] R: "many."

[355] The first few words of the addition of R appear also in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 172, 11. 21f.; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 115, l. 1. The occurrence was interesting enough to Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī to quote (Annales, 191).

[356] According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 183, ed. Pellat, V, 162, he was killed accidentally by his own sword.

[357] See text above, n. 31; for his nickname, see above, n. 71. His grandfather, Dāwūd b. ʿĪsā b. Mūsā, played an important role in early ninth-century politics. His father ʿAbdallāh is mentioned in the text above, III, 1684, sub anno 252 (866). See also Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XVII, 473.

The Important Events of the Year 285

(JANUARY 28, 898 - JANUARY 16, 899)

One of the events was a holdup of the pilgrims in al-Ajfur.[358] They were attacked by Ṣāliḥ b. Mudrik al-Ṭā'ī[359] and a group of the Ṭayyi' on Wednesday, al-Muḥarram 18, 285 (Thursday, February 16, 898). The military leader of the caravan, al-Jinnī the Elder,[360] fought Ṣāliḥ, but the Arab tribesmen defeated the caravan, seizing all the property and merchandise in it as well as a number of free women and slaves.[361] The loot they got from the people was reportedly worth two million dīnārs.

On al-Muḥarram 23, 285 (February 21, 898),a document announcing the installation of ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār as governor of Transoxania and the removal of Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad[362] from this position was read to a group of Khurāsānian pilgrims in the palace of al-Muʿtaḍid.

On Ṣafar 5, 285 (March 3, 898), Waṣīf Kāmah[363] and a number of officers came to Madīnat al-Salām from al-Jabal. They came from Badr, the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, and ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān, carrying with them the head of al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz 358 One of the locations on the Mecca Road, between Fayd and al-Khuzaymiyyah. It was situated 216 km from Fayd, coming from al-Kūfah after al-Thaʿlabiyyah, and 64 km before Fayd, according to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 925 (al-Thaʿlabiyyah): II, 440 (al-Khuzaymiyyah); III, 96 (Fayd).

---

359 For his capture and death, see text below, 2191f. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 191ff,. ed, Pellat, V, 165f., adds the detail that he committed suicide with a knife. Ibn al-Muʿtazz (verses 299-318) deals with this episode and gives a remarkably vivid description of the troubles that were caused for the pilgrims by marauding bedouins.

360 See text below, 2241. He is identical with Jinnī al-Ṣafwānī (see below, n. 789). The form of his name cannot be considered certain.

361 R: wa-al-mamālīk.

362 That is, the Sāmānid (see above, n. 9).

363 Waṣīf Kāmah al-Daylamī is occasionally mentioned in the sources, as, for instance, Tanūkhī, Nishwār, VIII, 121, but little is known about him.

b. Abī Dulaf who was known as Abū Laylā. They brought it to al-Muʿtaḍid's Thurayyā palace. Abū Laylā's brother (ʿUmar) asked al-Muʿtaḍid to give it to him, and he did so. He also asked him for permission to bury it, and he granted that permission . On the same day, robes of honor were bestowed upon ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and a number of officers who had arrived in Baghdad.

In this year, the postmaster wrote from al-Kūfah, noting that on the night of Sunday, Rabīʿ I 20, 285 (Sunday, April 16, 898), a yellowish[364] wind // had risen in the region of al-Kūfah. It [2184] continued to blow until the time of the evening prayer. Then it turned black. All the while, the people humbly beseeched God. Immediately thereafter, it rained heavily with frightening thunderbolts and continuous flashes of lightning. Then, after a while, black and white stones with various shades of coloring,[365] and with a compression in the middle similar to stone-pestles used by perfumers,[366] fell in a village called Aḥmadābādh[367] and the region around it. The postmaster sent along one of the stones. It was sent to the government offices for the people to look at.

On Rabīʿ I 21, 285 (April 17, 898), Ibn al-Ikhshād[368] set out from Baghdad as amīr of Ṭarsūs, together with the persons who had come to Baghdad from Ṭarsūs with the request that a governor be appointed for them.[369]

---

[364] For the color aṣfar, commonly translated as yellow but tending toward light brown, see Fischer, Farb- und Formbezeichnungen, 358ff. The atmospheric events here and a few days later in al-Baṣrah seem related and appear to have been no ordinary dust storms. They may have been triggered by a great volcanic eruption in a remote place.

[365] "Colors" could also refer to kinds and shapes. The word is simplified to al-awzān "weights" in Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, Annales, 146. This reading also appears in the manuscript tradition of Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, VII, 339.

[366] An actual specimen of the perfumers' pestle is needed to understand the word translated as "compression." In Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, VII, 339, it is replaced by an equally opaque ṭabaq. Most later authors chose to omit it, for instance, Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī, loc. cit.; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 2; Ḥamawī, al-Taʾrīkh al-Manṣūrī, fol. 55b.

[367] See text above, III, 1518. The places called Aḥmadābādh mentioned by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 156, are not identical with the one referred to here.

[368] His death is mentioned in the text below, 2193. Ikhshād (also text above, II, 1242, etc.) is a variant of Ikhshīd; both forms reflect Ikhshēd. See Meier, "Aussprachefragen," 101f., and, in particular, 105.

[369] As mentioned among the events of the preceding year. See text above, III, 2163. For this and the following paragraph, see Canard, Sources arabes, 13.

On the same day, Fātik,[370] the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, left Baghdad to inspect the situation concerning the officials in Mosul, Diyār Rabīʿah, and the border regions of Syria and al-Jazīrah, and to make improvements with respect to it. This task was in addition to the duties he was responsible for after being put in charge of postal matters[371] in these districts.

In this year, the news reportedly arrived in Baghdad from al-Baṣrah that after the Friday prayer on Rabīʿ I, 25, 285 (Friday, April 21, 898), a yellowish wind arose there. It then turned color, first greenish[372] and then black. Following this, there was continuous rain, the like of which had never been seen before. Then large hail stones fell—a single one weighed (as much as) one hundred and fifty dirhams.[373] The wind uprooted more than five hundred palm trees from Nahr al-Ḥusayn,[374] and a hundred from [2185] Nahr Maʿqil.[375] / /

In this year, al-Khalīl b. Raymāl[376] died in Ḥulwān.

On Jumādā II 5,[377] 285 (June 29, 898), word reached the central authorities that Bakr b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Dulaf had died of some disease in Ṭabaristān and had been buried there. The person who brought the news was reportedly given one thousand dīnārs.

In this year, al-Muʿtaḍid appointed Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj to take over the administration in Ādharbayjān and Armenia. He 370 Fātik was killed together with the wazīr al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan in connection with the affair of Ibn al-Muʿtazz. See Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 5, and the other sources.

---

371 The head of the postal (intelligence) service was particularly well qualified to investigate official misconduct, which was apparently suspected here.

372 See Fischer, Farb- und Formbezeichnungen, 237. What is described here, is a gradual change in color from light to dark.

373 That is, assuming a weight of 2.97 gram for the dirham, about 445.5 gram or one (American) pound, but, of course, no exact figure was intended, and the weight standard assumed here cannot be ascertained.

374 Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 3, 1. 2, reads Nahr al-Ḥasan.

375 Nahr Maʿqil is often mentioned in the text. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 468.

376 See text above, III, 2018, for his appointment as governor of Ḥulwān in the year 268 (881-2). The vocalization of Raymāl seems somewhat uncertain.

377 R: "Jumādā II 24," which is incorrect.

had seized power (in these regions) earlier and then defied (the central authorities). Robes of honor and gift horses[378] were sent to him.

On Shaʿbān 3, 285 (August 25, 898), word reached Baghdad that the eunuch Rāghib, the mawlā of al-Muwaffaq, had undertaken a sea raid (against the Byzantines). God gave him victory over many ships and all the Byzantines aboard. He decapitated three thousand of the Byzantines who had been in the ships, ⌜and burned the ships⌝. He conquered many Byzantine fortresses. The raiders returned safely.[379]

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 285 (December 19, 898-January 16, 899), word arrived in Baghdad that Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Shaykh had died and that after a power struggle his son, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā,[380] had taken charge of Āmid and its environs, areas which had been controlled by his father.

On Dhū al-Ḥijjah 19, 285 (January 6, 899), al-Muʿtaḍid left Baghdad for Āmid. He was accompanied by his son Abū Muḥammad and the officers and pages. He left the chamberlain, Ṣāliḥ al-Amīn, behind to take his place in Baghdad. He put him in charge of the maẓālim courts, the two bridges, and other matters.

In this year, Hārūn b. Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn and the Egyptian officers with him sent Waṣīf Qāṭarmīz[381] to al-Muʿtaḍid to ask that he peacefully cede to them the areas of Egypt and Syria in their possession, and that the Caliph bestow upon Hārūn the executive powers that had been his father's. Waṣīf came to Baghdad, and al-Muʿtaḍid sent him back accompanied

---

[378] Or, "gifts carried by animals."

[379] See Canard, Sources arabes, 13.

[380] See text below, 2190f. According to *EI*², s. v. ʿĪsā b. al-Shaykh (IV, 90b), Muḥammad b. Aḥmad disappears from view in 297/300.

[381] In the final months of the Ṭūlūnids, at the end of 291 (October-November, 904), Waṣīf Qāṭarmīz attempted to flee from Damyānah at Tinnīs but was eventually captured. See Kindī, Wulāh, 245f.; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 146, l. 15. Slightly different spellings of the name are used there, in addition to the final n that appears in RC.

[2186] by ʿAbdallāh // b. al-Fatḥ[382] who was to transmit messages to them orally and impose certain conditions upon them.[383] Waṣīf and Ibn al-Fatḥ left Baghdad on their mission at the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah of this year (mid-January, 899).

In Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 285 (December 19, 898-January 16, 899), Ibn al-Ikhshād led the people of Ṭarsūs and others on a campaign (against the Byzantines). He got as far as Salandū[384] and conquered it. He returned to Ṭarsūs in the year 286 (899).

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Dāwūd al-Hāshimī.

---

[382] In addition to the information in Ṭabarī, the house of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Fatḥ is mentioned by Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 78, sub anno 321 (933). He appears to be identical with the person mentioned by Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 44, who brought gifts from Khumārawayh to al-Muʿtaḍid.

[383] As specified in the text below, 2187.

[384] See text above, III, 2130, and below, 2269. Canard, Sources arabes, 10, 13, has no comment, but Vasiliev, 122, maintains the old and questionable identification with a locality now called Selindi/Selinti. R: "Samandū." Salandū may, in fact, be a dissimilated form of Samandū which has been identified with Tsamandos on the upper reaches of the Zamanti-su, a tributary of the Sayḥān, see F. Hild, Das byzantinische Strassensystem in Kappadokien, 90 f. (Vienna, 1977). See also text above, III, 2130.

The Important Events of the Year 286

(JANUARY 17, 899 - JANUARY 6, 900)

One of the events was that Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj dispatched his son who was known as Abū al-Musāfir[385] to Baghdad as a hostage. This was to assure the loyalty and sincerity which he pledged to the central authorities. Abū al-Musāfir reportedly arrived in Baghdad on Tuesday, al-Muḥarram 7, 286 (Tuesday, January 26, 899), with gifts of horses, furnishings, and so on. At the time, al-Muʿtaḍid was absent from Baghdad.

In Rabīʿ II, 286 (April 16-May 14, 899),[386] al-Muʿtaḍid bi-llāh had reached Āmid and encamped with his soldiers to lay siege to the city. Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Shaykh had locked the gates of the city of Āmid against him and against his partisans in it. Al-Muʿtaḍid had distributed his armies around the city and laid siege to the inhabitants. This took place late in the second half of Rabīʿ I, 286 (first half of April, 899). Following that, battles broke out between them. Mangonels were set up against the inhabitants of Āmid who in turn set up mangonels on their wall, and they bombarded each other.

On Saturday, Jumādā I 19, 286 (Saturday, June 2, 899). Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. / / ʿĪsā sent word to al-Muʿtaḍid seeking guarantees of safe-conduct for himself, his family, and the inhabitants of Āmid. Al-Muʿtaḍid granted that to him. On the same day, Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā with his men and allies left and went to al-Muʿtaḍid. The Caliph bestowed robes of honor upon him and his ranking men. They then departed for a tent which [2187] had been prepared for them, while al-Muʿtaḍid moved from his camp to the mansions and houses of Ibn ʿĪsā b. Shaykh. Al-Muʿtaḍid reported that in a dispatch to Madīnat al-Salām, dated Sunday, Jumādā I 20, 286 (Sunday, June 3, 899). On Jumādā I 25, 286 (June 8, 899), al-Muʿtaḍid's dispatch reporting his conquest reached Madīnat al-Salām, whereupon it was read from the pulpit in the Friday Mosque.

[385] Abū al-Musāfir Fatḥ was killed in al-Marāghah in 317 (929). See ʿArīb, 145; *EI*², s. v. Sādjids.

[386] If Rabīʿ II is correct, the first half of this paragraph was presumably taken from some dispatch speaking of earlier events.

In this year, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Fatḥ returned from Egypt to al-Muʿtaḍid, who was staying in Āmid, with replies to al-Muʿtaḍid's letters to Hārūn b. Khumārawayh. He informed the Caliph that Hārūn promised to hand over administrative control of Qinnasrīn and the fortified cities[387] and to send four hundred and fifty thousand dīnārs annually to the treasury in Madīnat al-Salām. He was asking that his rule over Egypt and Syria be reconfirmed and that al-Muʿtaḍid send him one of his eunuchs for the purpose. Al-Muʿtaḍid granted his request and dispatched Badr al-Qudāmī[388] and ʿAbdallāh b. al-Fatḥ with the (letter of) appointment and robes of honor. They left Āmid for Egypt on this assignment. Al-Muʿtaḍid's officials took over the administrative control of Qinnasrīn and the fortified cities from Hārūn's men in Jumādā II, 296 (May 15-June 13, 899). Al-Muʿtaḍid stayed on in Āmid for the remainder of Jumādā I and through twenty-three days of Jumādā II. On Saturday, Jumādā II 22, 286 (Thursday, July 5, 899),[389] he traveled from Āmid to al-Raqqah. In his place at Āmid, he left his son ʿAlī with troops that he had attached to him in order to secure the region and establish administrative control [2188] of Qinnasrīn and the fortified cities / / as well as Diyār Rabīʿah and Diyār Muḍar. The secretary of ʿAlī b. al-Muʿtaḍid at that time was al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr al-Naṣrānī. (Al-Muʿtaḍid)[390] put al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr in charge of affairs concerning the region and of the correspondence with the administrative officials there.

---

[387] On ʿawāṣim and thughūr, see *EI*², s. v. ʿawāṣim.

[388] The vocalization is based upon the assumption that al-Qudāmī was named after a Qudāmah. I have not found further information about him.

[389] If al-Muʿtaḍid stayed in Āmid for twenty-three days, he probably left on Jumādā II 24, which would be Saturday, July 7.

[390] The subject of the verb (which is unlikely to be a passive) could be ʿAlī, but presumably it was al-Muʿtaḍid who made the appointment of the person in charge of supervising the transition from Ṭūlūnid to ʿAbbāsid control.

Al-Muʿtaḍid ordered the destruction of the wall of Āmid, and a portion of it was destroyed, while the rest could not be destroyed and was left intact.

In this year, gifts from ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār reached Baghdad from Naysābūr. The money he sent amounted to four million dirhams. There were twenty horses with ornamented saddles and bridles inlaid (with silver),[391] one hundred and fifty horses with embroidered saddle cloths, garments,[392] perfume, and falcons. This was on Thursday, Jumādā II 21, 286 (Wednesday, July 4, 899).

In this year, a Qarmaṭian known as Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī[393] appeared in al-Baḥrayn. A group of Arab tribesmen and Qarmaṭians had gathered around him, and he emerged as a rebel in the beginning of the year. In Jumādā II, 286 (June 14-July 13, 899), his men grew in number, and he gained strengh. He killed some villagers in the neighborhood, and then went to a place called al-Qaṭīf,[394] located at a distance of several days' journey from al-Baṣrah. There he killed the inhabitants. He reportedly wanted to march on al-Baṣrah. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Wāthiqī,[395] who was in charge of security in al-Baṣrah and the Tigris districts at the time, informed the Caliph in writing about what he had heard concerning the plans of the Qarmaṭians. The Caliph wrote back, ordering him and Muḥammad b. Hishām[396] who was in charge of administering the charitable foundations, the land tax, and the estates[397] there, to construct a (protective) wall around al-Baṣrah. Expenses for it were estimated at fourteen thousand dīnārs. The expenditures were authorized, and the wall was built.

---

391 The list in Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 41, omits this item and the preceding one but has the rest as in Ṭabarī.

392 Kuswah or kiswah is often used as a collective and also has the approximate meaning of complete wardrobe.

393 One of the important and much discussed leaders of the Qarmaṭian movement, d. 301 (913). See the brief note in EI², s. v. al-Djannābī; also text below, 2291.

394 See EI², s. v. Ḳaṭīf.

395 For his activities as chief of police in Baghdad in 291, see text below, 2245; ʿArīb, 4.

396 No further information about him seems available.

397 That is, the estates belonging to the Caliph.

In Rajab, 286 (July 13-August 11, 899), a group of Arab tribesmen [2189] of the Banū // Shaybān reached al-Anbār. They raided the villages, killed the people whom the encountered, and drove away the cattle. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Kumushjūr,[398] who was in charge of security there, went out against them, but he was unable to subdue them. He wrote the Caliph concerning them, and the latter sent Nafīs al-Muwalladī,[399] Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Zaranjī,[400] and al-Muẓaffar b. Ḥājj[401] with about a thousand men to aid him. They reached the location of the Arab tribesmen and attacked them in a place known as al-Manqabah[402] in the administrative district of al-Anbār, but the Arab tribesmen routed them and killed their men. Most of them drowned in the Euphrates, and they were dispersed.The dispatch from Ibn Ḥājj reporting the battle and the rout of the government force by the Arab tribesmen arrived at Baghdad on Monday, Rajab 24, 286 (Sunday, August 5, 899). The Arab tribesmen stayed on to harass the region and to extort protection money from the villages. When al-Muʿtaḍid was informed in writing about their story, he sent al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr al-Ghanawī[403] and Khafīf al-Adhkūtakīnī[404] and a number of (other) officers from al-Raqqah to engage them in combat. At the end of Shaʿbān, 286 (September 398 R: "Kushmard," which is apparently the correct form, as in the text below, 2238. According to ʿArīb, 119, sub anno 312 (924), Ibn Kushmard (spelled Qushmard) was captured by the Qarmaṭians and presumably killed. See also Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 57. This makes any speculation as to whether he might be a son of the aforementioned Muḥammad b. Kumushjūr (see above, n. 154) superfluous. But see also below, n. 526.

---

399 See text below, 2274, quoted by ʿArīb, 16; Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 375, l. 12. During the struggle with the Qarmaṭians, many military leaders on both sides played important but fleeting roles, and there is understandably little information available for them.

400 See text above, III, 1996, sub anno 267 (881). All three Ṭabarī manuscripts have something like al-Zarnījī.

401 Al-Muẓaffar was governor of Ṭarsūs for a while (see text below, 2222) He was posted to the Yemen in 293 (906) (see text below, 2267, 2280; ʿArīb, 13, 19). He supposedly died there in Rajab, 298 (March, 911). See Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 9 (who has Ḥāmid ?); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, sub anno. Note that when his brother ʿAjj (ʿUjj) died in 306 (918), a brother of his was appointed to succeed him. See ʿArīb, 76. For ʿAjj, see below, n. 483. The precise form of the name of their father remains somewhat uncertain, as it is pointed in various ways in the manuscripts.

402 The reading appears quite uncertain. I have not succeeded in identifying this locality.

403 Al-Ghanawī d. Rabīʿ II, 305 (September-October 917). See ʿArīb, 68f.

404 I have found no information concerning him other than this text. The Adhkūtakīn with whom he was connected is presumably the one mentioned in the text above, III, 1936.

9, 899), those officers reached Hīt. The Arab tribesmen learned about them and left their location in the countryside of al-Anbār. They moved toward ʿAyn al-Tamr where they set up camp. The officers entered al-Anbār[405] and remained there, while the Arab tribesmen harassed ʿAyn al-Tamr and the region of al-Kūfah as they had the region of al-Anbār. This situation continued through the rest of Shaʿbān[406] and all through Ramaḍān (ending October 9, 899)./ / [2190]

In this year, al-Muʿtaḍid sent word to Rāghib, the mawlā of Abū Aḥmad (al-Muwaffaq), who was in Ṭarsūs, ordering him to come to him in al-Raqqah. He came while al-Muʿtaḍid was there. When Rāghib arrived, al-Muʿtaḍid left him alone in his camp for a day, then, seizing him the next day, he incarcerated him and seized everything he had with him. Word concerning this reached Madīnat al-Salām on Monday, Shaʿbān 9,[407] 286 (Monday, August 20, 899). Several days later, Rāghib died. Maknūn,[408] the page of Rāghib, was arrested as were Rāghib's men. Rāghib's property in Ṭarsūs was seized on Tuesday, Shaʿbān 23, 286 (Monday, September 3, 899).[409] The person in charge of seizing them[410] was Ibn al-Ikhshād.

On Ramaḍān 20, 286 (September 29, 899), al-Muʿtaḍid sent Mu'nis al-Khāzin[411] against the Arab tribesmen in the region of al-Kūfah and ʿAyn al-Tamr. He attached to him al-Abbās b. ʿAmr, Khafīf al-Adhkūtakīnī, and other officers. Mu'nis and those with him traveled as far as a place called Nīnawā,[412] where he found

---

405 R: "traveled to al-Anbār."

406 R: "Rajab and Shaʿbān."

407 R: "seven."

408 See text above, III, 2132.

409 The text has Rajab. This is unlikely because it would mean that the property was confiscated before Rāghib's arrest. Moreover, the indicated day of the week fits only Shaʿbān.

410 R: akhdhahū "seizing it," referring to the property.

411 R : "Mu'nis al-Khādim." Such a confusion with the later much more prominent Mu'nis al-Khādim al-Muẓaffar (see below, n. 449) could easily happen. Mu'nis al-Khāzin, also known as Mu'nis al-Faḥl (see below, n. 559), died on Sunday, Ramaḍān 22, 301 (April 21, 914, which, however, was a Thursday). See ʿArīb, 45 (where the manuscript reads al-Khādim).

412 Not the biblical Niniveh but a district in the region of al-Kūfah, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 870.

that the Arab tribesmen had left their location. Some of them had entered the desert of the Mecca Road, and others the Syrian desert. He remained where he was for several days and then went to Madīnat al-Salām.

In Shawwāl, 286 (October 10-November 7, 899), al-Muʿtaḍid and ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān put Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. al-Jarrāḥ[413] in charge of the Dīwān of the East,[414] from which Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Furāt[415] was dismissed. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Dāwūd b. al-Jarrāḥ[416] was put in charge of the Dīwān of the West, from which Ibn al-Furāt was also dismissed.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Hāshimī.

[413] Ibn al-Jarrāḥ, b. 243 (857-8) (see Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 390), d. 296 (908). He was the uncle of the following ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā and a son-in-law of the wazīr ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān. He served Ṭabarī as an important source of historical information, see text above, III, 2198, and below. See EI², s. v. Ibn al-Djarrāḥ, and the work of H. Bowen on his nephew, The Life and Times of ʿAlī b. ʿĪsà.

[414] The Dīwān(s) of the East and the West were the government departments in charge of the tax income from the provinces to the east and the west of the Iraq. The passage is quoted (via Ibn Khaldūn) by Talbi, Émirat, 328, in connection with his attempt to define the jurisdiction of the Dīwān al-Maghrib. See also above, n. 21, and below, n. 423.

[415] D. 291 (904). See EI², s. v. Ibn al-Furāt.

[416] For ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā [245-334 (859-946)], see EI², s. v. ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, and above, n. 413.

The Events of the Year 287

(JANUARY 7 - DECEMBER 25, 900)

One of the events was al-Muʿtaḍid's arrest of Muḥammad b. Aḥmad b. / / ʿĪsā b. Shaykh and some members of his family. He had them put in chains and imprisoned in the house of Ibn Ṭāhir.[417] The reason reported for this was that one of Muḥammad's relatives had gone to ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān and informed him that Muḥammad was about to flee with a number of his men and his family. ʿUbaydallāh wrote al-Muʿtaḍid about this, and the Caliph replied, ordering ʿUbaydallāh to arrest him. ʿUbaydallāh did that on Wednesday, al-Muḥarram 4, 287 (Thursday, January 10, 900). [2191]

In al-Muḥarram, 287 (January 7-February 5, 900), a letter reached the central authorities in Baghdad from Abū al-Agharr. It reported that the Ṭayyiʾ had gathered against him, enlisting the help of the Arab tribesmen that they were able to, and had struck the pilgrim caravan. They attacked the pilgrims some ten mīl (20 km) beyond al-Maʿdin,[418] while they were returning from Mecca to Madīnat al-Salām. The horsemen and foot soldiers of the Arab tribesmen, with their tents, womenfolk, and camels, advanced toward them. The foot soldiers numbered more than three thousand men. A battle broke out between them and lasted all day long.

---

[417] The house of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir [d. 253 (867)] served for a while as a prison. See text above, III, 2111. The Caliphs al-Muʿtaḍid and al-Muktafī were buried there.

[418] Among the many "Mines," this one was known as Maʿdin al-Nuqrah or al-Naqīrah. Masʿūdī speaks in this context of some location between Maʿdin al-Qurashī and al-Ḥājir, a place before Maʿdin al-Nuqrah (see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 182). Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 804, also speaks of Maʿdin al-Nuqrah as a Kūfan pilgrim station between Uḍāh and Māwān, or as a station on the Mecca Road which was reached from al-Ḥājir, where the roads to Mecca and to al-Madīnah divide. The commentators on Labīd, ed. Iḥsān ʿAbbās, 237, refer to a location "between al-Nibāj and al-Nuqrah."

That was Thursday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 27, 286 (Thursday, January 3, 900). When night fell, the two sides separated. The following morning, Friday, they again engaged in battle, this time from early morning to midday. God then gave victory to His friends. The Arab tribesmen turned back and fled, and did not reassemble after having dispersed. Abū al-Agharr and all the pilgrims then traveled on safely. He dispatched his letter with Saʿīd b. al-Aṣfar b. ʿAbd al-Aʿlā,[419] one of his distinguished cousins; he was the one who had managed the arrest of Ṣāliḥ b. Mudrik. On Saturday, al-Muḥarram 27, 287 (Saturday, February 2, 900), Abū al-Agharr [2192] arrived in Madīnat // al-Salām, parading before him the heads of Ṣāliḥ b. Mudrik, Jaḥnash,[420] and a black page of Ṣāliḥ as well as four captured cousins of Ṣāliḥ. Abū al-Agharr went to al-Muʿtaḍid's palace where a robe of honor and a gold necklace were bestowed upon him. The heads were displayed at the head of the Upper Bridge on the East Side. The captives were put into the dungeons.

On Ṣafar 25, 287 (March 1, 900), al-Muʿtaḍid came to Baghdad from his pleasure resort in Barāz al-Rūz[421] and ordered the construction of a castle in Barāz al-Rūz in a place chosen by him. Implements were taken there, and construction was begun.

In Rabīʿ I, 287 (March 6-April 4, 900), the Qarmaṭian problem in al-Baḥrayn became grave. They raided the region of Hajar,[422] with some of them coming close to the Baṣrah region. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā al-Wāthiqi wrote asking for reinforcements, and, at the end of the month, eight barges carrying three hundred men were sent to him. Al-Muʿtaḍid also ordered the muster of an army to be dispatched to al-Baṣrah.

On Sunday, Rabīʿ II 10, 287 (Monday, April 14, 900), Badr, the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, held a meeting in his house and looked [419] I have found no further information about him.

---

[420] The form of the name does not appear to be certain. R and others read Juḥaysh, which is a better known name.
[421] See text above, II, 906, 909.
[422] See *EI*², s. v. al-Ḥasā, the contemporary name of Hajar.

into the affairs of the inner circle and the commoners, the land tax, the estates, and matters of security.

On Monday, Rabīʿ II 11, 287 (Tuesday, April 15, 900), Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd al-Kātib died. He had been in charge of the comptroller's office for the tax revenues of the East and the West.[423] ⌜On Wednesday, Rabīʿ II 13, 287 (Thursday, April 17, 900,)⌝ Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ[424] was put in charge of this office. He went there the very same day and held a meeting. // [2193]

In Rabīʿ II 287 (April 5-May 3, 900), al-Muʿtaḍid put ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr al-Ghanawī in charge of al-Yamāmah and al-Baḥrayn. He also put him in charge of the campaign against Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī and the Qarmaṭians with him. The Caliph attached about two thousand men to al-ʿAbbās. Al-ʿAbbās encamped in al-Firk[425] for several days, until he was joined by his men. He then went to al-Baṣrah and from there proceeded to al-Baḥrayn and al-Yamāmah.

In this year, the enemy reportedly arrived at the Qalamyah Gate of Ṭarsūs. This was on Thursday, Rabīʿ I 23, 287 (Friday, March 28, 900). After the death of Ibn al-Ikhshād, Abū Thābit[426] became amīr of Ṭarsūs. Ibn al-Ikhshād had left Abū Thābit behind to take his place there when he went on a raid and died. Abū Thābit marched in pursuit of the enemy as far as Nahr al-Rayḥān.[427] He was captured, and the people with him suffered severe losses. At the time Ibn Kallūb was on a raid in Darb al-Salāmah.[428] When he returned from it, he gathered the elders of the border towns in order to have them agree upon an amīr to take charge of their affairs. They agreed upon ʿAlī b. al-Aʿrābī[429]

---

[423] See above, n. 21, and Talbi, Émirat, 328 (above, n. 414).

[424] He was no doubt the official of the wazīr ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān mentioned in Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 12f.

[425] Near Kalwādhā. See *EI*², s. v. Kalwādhā.

[426] I have no further information about him.

[427] I have not succeeded in identifying the location of this river.

[428] See Honigmann, Ostgrenze, 86f., who indicates that Darb al-Salāmah is identical with Darb al-Ḥadath. See also Canard, Sources arabes, 14, who translates "Pyles Ciliciennes."

[429] I have no further information about him.

and put him in charge after some opposition from Abū Thābit's son. The latter mentioned[430] that his father had appointed him to take his place. He gathered a number of people to fight the local population, until Ibn Kallūb intervened. The son of Abū Thābit then declared himself satisfied. This was in Rabīʿ II 287 (April 5-May 3, 900). At the time, al-Nughayl[431] was on a raid in Byzantine territory; he then returned to Ṭarsūs. It was reported that Abū Thābit and a number of Muslims had been taken from the fortress of Qūniyah[432] to Constantinople.

In Rabīʿ II, 287 (April 5-May 3, 900), Isḥāq b. Ayyūb died. He [2194] had been / / in charge of security in Diyār Rabīʿah. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Haytham b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿtamir[433] was given charge of his official functions.

On Wednesday, Jumādā I 25, 287 (Wednesday, May 28, 900), a dispatch reportedly reached the central authorities in Baghdad stating that Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad had captured ʿAmr al-Ṣaffār and allowed his camp to be looted. The story of ʿAmr and Ismāʿīl was as follows: ʿAmr had asked the Caliph to appoint him governor of Transoxania, and al-Muʿtaḍid had done so. While ʿAmr was staying in Naysābūr, al-Muʿtaḍid sent him robes of honor and the standard indicating his new rank as governor. When ʿAmr left to fight Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad, the latter wrote him, "You are already in control of a wide area, whereas I am in a border region and have only Transoxania. Thus, be satisfied with what you have, and let me stay in this border region!" ʿAmr refused to give in. When the Oxus and the difficulty of crossing it were mentioned to him, he said, "If I wanted to dam the Oxus with money bags and cross it, I would do it."

Seeing no hope that ʿAmr would turn back and leave him alone, Ismāʿīl gathered his men and the small landowners and village chiefs and crossed the river to the west bank. ʿAmr then [430] The active seems preferable here to the usual passive "reportedly." See Canard, Sources arabes, 14.

---

[431] See Ibn al-Muʿtazz (verses 355-59) and his contemptuous statement that Nughayl is a misspelling of bughayl "little mule."

[432] That is, modern Konya. R: maʿa man ḥaḍara nawbatahū, for min Ḥiṣn Qūniyah.

[433] RB: "Muʿammar." I have no further information about him.

came and encamped at Balkh. Ismāʿīl cut off the surrounding region to ʿAmr, so that he was, in effect, under siege. ʿAmr now regretted what he had done, and reportedly[434] sought to prevent the outbreak of fighting, but (now) Ismāʿīl did not want that. After just a little fighting, ʿAmr was routed. Turning back, he fled and came to a swamp along the road. Informed that it was a shortcut, he told the rank and file with him to follow the well-marked road, while he himself went with a few people and entered the swamp. His horse became mired in it and fell down. ʿAmr was now at a loss as to what to do. Those who were with him did not remain but left him. Ismāʿīl's men came and captured him. When // the story of ʿAmr and Ismāʿīl was reported to [2195] al-Muʿtaḍid, he reportedly praised Ismāʿīl and criticized ʿAmr.[435]

On Jumādā I 29, 287 (June 1, 900), word reached the central authorities in Baghdad that Waṣīf, the eunuch of Ibn Abī al-Sāj, had broken with Ibn Abī al-Sāj and his men and that he had fled from Bardhaʿah to Malaṭyah. He wrote to al-Muʿtaḍid asking him for an appointment as governor of the border regions. Al-Muʿtaḍid wrote to him and ordered him to come to him.[436] (So al-Muʿtaḍid) sent Rashīq al-Ḥuramī[437] to him.

On Rajab 7, 287 (July 8, 900), al-Muʿtaḍid's wife, the daughter of Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, died and was buried in the castle of al-Ruṣāfah.

On Rajab 10, 287 (July 11, 900), three persons sent by Waṣīf, the eunuch of Ibn Abī al-Sāj, came to the central authorities in Baghdad. He had sent them to al-Muʿtaḍid in order to ask the Caliph that he (Waṣīf) be made governor of the border regions [434] Text: dhukira; R: dhakarū; B: dhukira lī.

---

[435] The passage was quoted by Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, VI, 426f., under Yaʿqūb al-Ṣaffār. Ibn Khallikān, op. cit., VI, 431, also refers briefly to the paragraph in the text below, 2196f.

[436] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 11, adds, probably from a recension of Ṭabarī: "but he took his time."

[437] R: "al-Khādim." Rashīq al-Aysar al-Ḥuramī is mentioned in ʿArīb, 184, sub anno 320 (932). Rashīq al-Ḥuramī can thus be assumed to be identical with Rashīq al-Aysar. See ʿArīb, 56, 181; Eclipse, I, 229, sub anno 319. According to ʿArīb, 56, he was related by marriage to Naṣr al-Qushūrī, who was presumably his father-in-law.

and that robes of honor be sent to him. Al-Muʿtaḍid reportedly gave orders that the emissaries be made to confess the reason why Waṣīf had separated from his master Ibn Abī al-Sāj and gone to the border regions. Beaten until they confessed, they admittted that the separation was based on an understanding between Waṣīf and his master. That is, when Waṣīf reached the place where he was now, his master would join him, and together they would move against Egypt[438] and subdue it. This became common knowledge, and people talked about it.

On Rajab 11, 287 (July 12, 900), Ḥāmid b. al-ʿAbbās[439] was put in charge of the land tax and the estates of Fārs, which had been under the control of ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār. His letters of appointment were handed over to his brother Aḥmad b. al-[2196] ʿAbbās.[440] Ḥāmid had been / / staying in Wāsiṭ, because he was governor of the city and the Tigris counties. He wrote to ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī, who was in Iṣbahān, asking him to come to Fārs to take charge of security.

In this year, al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr al-Ghanawī and the troops attached to him reportedly left al-Baṣrah together with the Baṣran volunteers, who were ready to fight with him, in order to march against Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī and the Qarmaṭians who made common cause with him. When Abū Saʿīd's vanguards met them, al-ʿAbbās left his train behind and moved toward them. He encountered Abū Saʿīd and the men with him in the evening. They engaged in combat, until night interrupted contact between them, and both parties returned to their respective locations. During the night, the Arab tribesmen of the Banū Ḍabbah who were with al-ʿAbbās went to al-Baṣrah; they numbered about three hundred. They were followed by the Baṣran volunteers. Early in the morning, al-ʿAbbās started to engage the Qarmaṭians

---

[438] Text: Muḍar, but see Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCIX, as well as R where the vocalization is clearly Miṣr. See also Canard, Sources arabes, 15. "Muḍar" is quite unlikely, but if Egypt is meant, it would seem to have been an unreasonable plan. At any rate, the enterprise constituted a considerable threat to the government in Baghdad; thus, the rumors circulating there had political significance.

[439] For Ibn al-ʿAbbās [233-311 (837-923)], see *EI*², s. v. Ḥāmid b. al-ʿAbbās.

[440] Aḥmad b. al-ʿAbbās died in Shaʿbān, 304 (January-February, 917). See ʿArīb, 63.

in combat, and the fighting was fierce. The commander of al-ʿAbbās's left wing, Najāḥ,[441] the page of Aḥmad b. ʿĪsā b. Shaykh, attacked the right wing of Abū Saʿīd with a number[442] of his men—about a hundred strong. They broke through the right wing, but Najāḥ and all those with him were killed. Al-Jannābī and his men now attacked al-ʿAbbās's men, and the latter were routed. Al-ʿAbbās surrendered, and about seven hundred of his men were captured. Al-Jannābī took possession of what was in al-ʿAbbās's camp. The day after the battle, al-Jannābī had al-ʿAbbās's men who had been captured brought before him, and then had them all killed. Following that, he ordered firewood thrown upon the corpses and had them burned. This battle reportedly took place at the end of Rajab, 287 (July 31, 900). Word concerning it reached Baghdad on Shaʿbān 4, 287 (August 4, 900).

In this year, al-Jannābī reportedly reached Hajar. He entered it and granted guarantees of safe-conduct / / to its inhabitants. This [2197] was after his return from the battle with al-ʿAbbās. He routed the remnant of [443] the men of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr who were on their way to al-Baṣrah. Only a small number of them managed to escape, and without provisions and clothing. A group of about four hundred pack animals carrying food, clothing, and water left al-Baṣrah to meet them. The Banū Asad reportedly went out against them. They seized the pack animals and their loads and killed a number of the men who were with those animals, as well as the men of al-ʿAbbās who had escaped. This was in Ramaḍān, 287 (August 30-September 28, 900). Al-Baṣrah was greatly disturbed by this event, and the inhabitants thought of moving away. But Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Wāthiqī, who was in charge of security there, forbade them to leave. They feared that the Qarmaṭians would assault them.

On Ramaḍān 8, 287 (September 6, 900), a mail pouch from al-Ubullah reportedly reached the central authorities with the information that Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī had released al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr and one of his eunuchs and that al-ʿAbbās was arriving on [441] I have no further information concerning him.

---

[442] R: mṭwʿh "volunteers from" (?).
[443] R: "people from."

a seagoing vessel. On Ramaḍān 11, 287 (September 9, 900), al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr arrived at Madīnat al-Salām and went to al-Muʿtaḍid's Thurayyā palace. It is reported that he had remained with al-Jannābī for several days after the battle. Then al-Jannābī summoned al-ʿAbbās and asked him whether he would like to be released. When al-ʿAbbās replied, "yes," al-Jannābī said, "Then go and tell the one who sent you ⌜against me⌝ what you have seen!"[444] He gave him animals to ride on and attached some of his men to him. He had them outfitted with the needed provisions and water, and ordered the men whom he sent with al-ʿAbbās to bring him to a place where he would be safe. They traveled with him until they reached one of the places along the coast. There he found a boat to carry him to al-Ubullah. Al-Muʿtaḍid bestowed a robe of honor upon him and gave him leave to return to his residence.

On Thursday, Shawwāl 11, 287 (Thursday, October 9, 900), [2198] al-Muʿtaḍid left // his tent at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah to go in pursuit of Waṣīf, the eunuch of Ibn Abī al-Sāj. He kept his intention concealed, stating (officially) that he was going toward Diyār Muḍar.

On Friday, Shawwāl 12, 287 (Friday, October 10, 900), news reportedly reached the central authorities that the Qarmaṭians in the Sawād from among the inhabitants of Junbulā'[445] had attacked

---

[444] The Qarmaṭian's message and al-Muʿtaḍid's reaction to it are reported in al-Ghanawī's name by Tanūkhī, Faraj, I, 98f., see de Goeje, Carmathes, Appendix, IX-XI; Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 13-16; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, V, 133f.; al-ʿUyūn wa-al-ḥadāʾiq, ed. Dāwūd, I, 161-64, ed. Saʿīdī, I, 94f. Since Miskawayh systematically quotes Ṭabarī, it might be suspected that he also derived this most interesting report from a recension of the History. This, however, does not seem to be the case. The source for this report from al-Ghanawī (as well as for the other addition in Miskawayh, see above, Foreword, xviii f.) was the qāḍī Abū al-Ḥasan Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid who was still alive in 356 (967) as indicated in Tanūkhī, Nishwār, II, 157, ed. Margoliouth, Table-Talk, text, 185 (Oriental Translation Fund, N. S. 27-28). He cannot be assumed to have had contact with Ṭabarī; moreover, the chain of transmitters leads back to the Tanūkhīs. If Masʿūdī's Kitāb al-Awsaṭ were preserved, we would probably know more about the transmission of al-Jannābī's message, since it contained a lengthy treatment of the episode. See Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 193f., ed. Pellat, V, 166f. A different version is found in Maqrīzī, Ittiʿāẓ, 110f.

[445] Located between Wāsiṭ and al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 126.

their governor Badr,[446] the page of al-Ṭā'ī, killed a number of Muslims, including women and children, and burned the residences.

On Dhū al-Qa'dah 14, 287 (November 10, 900), al-Mu'taḍid encamped at Kanīsat al-Sawdā'[447] while searching for the eunuch Waṣīf. He remained there, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday (November 12-14), until the men caught up with him. The Caliph wanted to travel in the direction of al-Maṣṣīṣah, but the spies came to him with the information that the eunuch was going to 'Ayn Zarbah. So he ordered the border-region couriers and knowledgeable people brought to him and asked them about the most direct road to 'Ayn Zarbah. In the morning of Thursday, Dhū al-Qa'dah 17, 287 (Thursday, November 13, 900), they crossed the Jayḥān with him. He sent his son 'Alī together with al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī Kūrah in the vanguard. Following 'Alī in order were Ja'far b. Si'r,[448] Muḥammad b. Kumushjūr, Khāqān al-Mufliḥī, ⌜Mu'nis al-Khādim⌝[449] and Mu'nis al-Khāzin. Following them, al-Mu'taḍid came with the chamber pages.[450] Passing by 'Ayn Zarbah, the Caliph had a tent set up for himself there. He left Khafīf al-Samarqandī behind there with his train, while he himself marched behind the officers after the eunuch. After the afternoon prayer, he received the good news that the eunuch had been captured. The eunuch was brought // to al-Mu'taḍid who [2199] turned him over to Mu'nis al-Khāzin,[451] chief of the military police at the time. He further ordered that guarantees of safe-conduct be [446] He is first mentioned in the text above, III, 2107, sub anno 271 (885), as attached to Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj. He appears once more below, 2202. His master al-Ṭā'ī is the individual mentioned above, n. 79.

[447] As described by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 314, the place was named thus because of its church (kanīsah) built of black (sawdā') stone, and it was located in the region of al-Maṣṣīṣah.

[448] R: Sa'd. I have no further information about him.

[449] Mu'nis al-Khādim, called al-Muẓaffar "The Victorious One" after his successes, particularly in Egypt. He died, after a glorious career, in 321 (933) at the age of about ninety. See Dhahabī, 'Ibar, II, 188. He is, of course, mentioned in all the histories of al-Muqtadir. See Eclipse, Index, 95f.

[450] On the chamber pages (ghilmān al-ḥujar or al-ḥujariyyah), see *EI*², s. v. ghulām (II, 1080a).

[451] Text: al-Khādim; read al-Khāzin as in RC. Note that al-Khādim also appears in the somewhat different description of this episode in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, VIII, 198, ed. Pellat, V, 168. The position indicated here does not, it seems, make it possible for us to determine with certainty which Mu'nis is meant.

granted to the eunuch's men and that it be announced in the camp that those whose saddles contained anything looted from the eunuch's camp and who did not return it to his men would be outside the protection of the law. Therefore, the loot from the camp was returned to many of the eunuch's men. The battle and the capture of the eunuch Waṣīf reportedly took place on Thursday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 17, 287 (Thursday, November 13, 900). Thirty-six days had elapsed from the day al-Muʿtaḍid left his tent at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah to the day the eunuch was apprehended.

After the eunuch was apprehended, al-Muʿtaḍid reportedly went back to ʿAyn Zarbah and stayed there two days. On the morning of the third day, the inhabitants of ʿAyn Zarbah gathered and asked him to leave because of the shortage of food in town. Therefore he left on the third day. He encamped at al-Maṣṣīṣah with all his troops, except for Abū al-Agharr Khalīfah b. al-Mubārak whom he had sent to block the eunuch's way, so that he would not get to Marʿash and the Malaṭyah region, as he had already sent off his family and the families of his men to Marʿash. The eunuch's men who had fled learned about al-Muʿtaḍid's guarantees of safe-conduct and his order to return their belongings to them. They therefore joined the camp of al-Muʿtaḍid and accepted his guarantee of safe-conduct.

Al-Muʿtaḍid reportedly encamped at al-Maṣṣīṣah on Sunday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 20, 287 (Sunday, November 16, 900). He remained there until the following Sunday. He wrote to the dignitaries of Ṭarsūs asking them to join him there. Coming to him[452] were al-Nughayl, one of the chieftains of the two border regions,[453] and a son of his[454] as well as a man called Ibn al-Muhandis[455] and a number of others with them. Al-Muʿtaḍid detained them [2200] / / and others. He released most of them, but those whom he had detained, he took with him to Baghdad.[456] He was angry at them because they had reportedly corresponded with the eunuch Waṣīf.

---

452 RB: ilayhi, for (the misprint ?) ilayhim.

453 R: wujūh al-thaghrayn (see also C). Apparently the ʿawāṣim and thughūr are meant.

454 See Ibn al-Muʿtazz, verse 357.

455 No further information concerning him seems to be available.

456 The Caliph arrived in Baghdad on Ṣafar 7, 288 (January 31, 901). During his festive entry he paraded Waṣīf, al-Nughayl, al-Nughayl's son, and Ibn al-Muhandis through the streets, dressed in the manner usual on these occasions and seated on camels. See Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 198f., ed. Pellat, V, 129.

Al-Muʿtaḍid ordered the burning of all the seagoing vessels which the Muslims used for raids, together with all their equipment. Damyānah, the page of Yāzmān,[457] reportedly was the one who had advised him to do that because he held a grudge against the inhabitants of Ṭarsūs. Everything was burned. Among the ships, there were about fifty old ones, on which a large amount of money had been spent and the like of which are no longer built. The burning of these ships proved harmful to the Muslims and diminished their military potential, while it strengthened the Byzantines who were now safe from being raided by sea.

Al-Muʿtaḍid put al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī Kūrah in charge of the Syrian Border regions in response to a request of their inhabitants who agreed to his appointment.

Al-Muʿtaḍid reportedly left al-Maṣṣīṣah, and during the course of his journey he camped at the following places: Funduq al-Ḥusayn,[458] al-Iskandariyyah,[459] Baghrās, and, finally, Anṭākiyah where he arrived on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 2, 287 (November 28, 900). He stayed in Anṭākiyah until Dhū al-Ḥijjah 10, 287 (December 6, 900), and left early the following day. His itinerary went via Artāḥ, al-Athārib, Aleppo, where he stayed two days, al-Nāʿūrah, Khusāf, with Ṣiffīn on the Jazīrah side and the Treasury of the Commander of the Faithful ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib on the other side,[460] Bālis, Dawsar, and Baṭn Dāmān.[461] From there he went to al-Raqqah; he entered the city on Dhū al-Ḥijjah 21, 287 (December 17, 900), and remained there until Dhū al-Ḥijjah 27, 287 (December 23, 900).

On Shawwāl 24, 287 (October 22, 900), word reached the central authorities that Muḥammad b. Zayd al-ʿAlawī had been killed.[462] / / The reason why he was killed reportedly was this: When news [2201] of the capture of ʿAmr b. al-Layth by Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad reached Muḥammad b. Zayd, Ibn Zayd left with a large army for

---

457 See above, n. 180.

458 I have no further information on this locality.

459 That is, al-Iskandarūnah, Alexandrette.

460 Ṣiffīn is assumed to be located after Bālis on this itinerary. See Canard, Sources arabes, 17, and idem, Ḥamdanides, map between pp. 240 and 241.

461 See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 538f.

462 Those interested in al-Muʿtaḍid's supposed pro-ʿAlid stance maintained that he was grieved to hear the news. See Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 209, ed. Pellat, V, 173.

Khurāsān[463] which he had great hopes of conquering. He thought that the administrative authority that had accrued to Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad when ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār was governor of Khurāsān would not expand, and thus nobody would keep him from Khurāsān now that ʿAmr had been captured and no agent of the central authorities was there. When he reached Jurjān and stayed there, Ismāʿīl wrote to him and asked that he return to Ṭabaristān and leave Jurjān to him, but Ibn Zayd refused. As has been mentioned to me, Ismāʿīl therefore urged a man called Muḥammad b. Hārūn,[464] a lieutenant of Rāfiʿ b. Harthamah in the days when Rāfiʿ was in control of Khurāsān, to fight Muḥammad b. Zayd. Muḥammad b. Hārūn accepted, and Ismāʿīl attached many of his men and troops to him, sending him off to fight Ibn Zayd. Muḥammad b. Hārūn marched against Ibn Zayd; the two met at the Gate of Jurjān[465] and fought a fierce battle in which Muḥammad b. Hārūn's force was routed. Later Muḥammad b. Hārūn returned when the ranks of the ʿAlid (Ibn Zayd) had broken up. Now, the ʿAlid's force was routed. They turned back and fled, and many were reportedly killed. Ibn Zayd was wounded several times, his son Zayd[466] was captured, and Muḥammad b. Hārūn took possession of his camp and all it contained. Several days after the battle, Muḥammad b. Zayd died of the blows which he had sustained. He was buried at the Gate of Jurjān. His son Zayd was brought to Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad. Muḥammad b. Hārūn marched
[2202] on Ṭabaristān.//

On Saturday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 12, 287 (Saturday, November 8, 900), Badr, the page of al-Ṭāʾī, made a surprise attack on the Qarmaṭians in the region of Rūdhmastān[467] and elsewhere. He reportedly killed a great many of them but then withdrew, because 463 R: "Jurjān," also Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 194, ed. Pellat, V, 167. The other later sources read Khurāsān.

---

464 According to Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, VII, 365, Muḥammad b. Hārūn was captured after his defeat and flight (see text below, 2220f.). He died near the end of 290 (903). Supposedly he had started out as a tailor and then became a highway robber with a gang of low-class people he had gathered around himself in the desert of Sarakhs. Following that he entered the service of Rāfiʿ b. Harthamah.

465 Here, the capital of the region. See *EI*², s. v. Gurgān.

466 I have not found any further information about him.

467 See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCIX. R: Dwrmst'n, which is almost correct.

he feared that the Sawād might be ruined, since they were the peasants and laborers there. He searched for their leaders in various locations and killed those whom he came upon. The Caliph had previously reinforced Badr with a number of his soldiers and pages on account of the Qarmaṭians and the events caused by them.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Dāwūd.

The Events of the Year 288

(DECEMBER 26, 900 - DECEMBER 15, 901)

One of the events was that a report reached the central authorities in Baghdad mentioning the outbreak of pestilence[468] in Ādharbayjān. A large number of people died, so that there were not enough shrouds in which to bury the dead. They were buried in garments and felt blankets. Conditions then became so bad that they could no longer find anybody to bury the dead, and they were left lying in the streets. Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj died during this pestilence.[469]

In this year, the men of Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. al-Layth[470] entered Fārs and ejected the officials of the central authorities. This happened on Ṣafar 17, 288 (February 10, 901).

In this year, Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj, who was called Afshīn, [2203] died in Ādharbayjān. // His pages and a number of his men gathered and made his son Dēwdād b. Muḥammad[471] their amīr, against the opposition of Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj who dissociated himself from them.

On Rabīʿ II, 27, 288 (April 20, 901), a dispatch from the postmaster in al-Ahwāz arrived at Baghdad. He mentioned in it that the men of Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. al-Layth had reached Sanbīl[472] on their way toward al-Ahwāz.

[468] Wabā' could refer more specifically to the plague, but it is a general term for pestilence or epidemic. See Dols, Black Death.

[469] Ibn al-Athīr also refers to the death of Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj in this connection.

[470] His capture is reported in 297 (910). See text below, 2285; ʿArīb, 32.

[471] Dēwdād was named after his grandfather, Abū al-Sāj Dēwdād. The last mention of him occurs sub anno 307 (919-20). See Eclipse, I, 74.

[472] Sanbīl was located on the border of Khūzistān and Fārs. See Le Strange, Lands, 244, 269.

On Jumādā I 1, 288 (April 23, 901),[473] ʿAmr b. al-Layth was brought to Baghdad[474] by ʿAbdallāh b. al-Fatḥ, who had been sent by Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad, and by Ashnās,[475] a page of Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad. It has been mentioned to me that Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad gave ʿAmr the choice of remaining with him as a prisoner or being sent to the court of the Commander of the Faithful, and he chose the latter.

On Jumādā II 2, 288 (May 24, 901), a dispatch from the postmaster of al-Ahwāz reportedly arrived at Baghdad from al-Ahwāz. The postmaster mentioned in it that a dispatch from Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad had reached Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr, informing him that the central authorities had appointed him[476] governor of Sijistān and ordered him to go there. Ismāʿīl was coming to Fārs to attack Ṭāhir, and he would then return to Sijistān. Ṭāhir had rebelled[477] on this account. He had written to his cousin, who was staying in Arrajān with his army, and ordered him to come back to Fārs along with those with him.[478]

In this year, al-Muʿtaḍid, having learned that Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad had gained control of affairs in Fārs, appointed his mawlā Badr governor of that province [479] and ordered him to go there. On Jumādā II 7(9),[480] 288 [May 29 (31), 901], // he bestowed a [2204] robe of honor upon him and attached a number of officers to him. Badr then proceeded with a large force of soldiers and pages.

On Jumādā II 2, 288 (June 1, 901), ʿAbdallāh b. al-Fatḥ and Ashnās, the page of Ismāʿīl, left Baghdad to go to Ismāʿīl b.

---

[473] Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, VI, 427, in quoting this passage, adds the correct day of the week, Thursday, no doubt from a Ṭabarī manuscript.

[474] Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 200f., ed. Pellat, V, 170 (also VIII, 208f.; V, 173), adds that he was dressed in the fashion customary on such occasions.

[475] I have no further information about him.

[476] That is, Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad. It could hardly mean that Ṭāhir was given that appointment to draw him away from Fārs.

[477] RB: jazīʿa "had become afraid," which is possibly the more correct text.

[478] The text seems to suggest that this was Ṭāhir's cousin (R: "uncle") who was in Arrajān in the Province of Fārs, but no name of another son of ʿAmr except Muḥammad seems to be attested.

[479] From here to p. 104, l. 22, C is missing. See Foreward, xix.

[480] R: "seven"; B: "nine."

Aḥmad ⌜b. Sāmān⌝ with letters[481] from al-Muʿtaḍid and a corselet, a crown,[482] and a sword of gold, completely encrusted with jewels. He also sent gifts and three million dirhams for distribution among Khurāsānian soldiers to be sent to Sijistān to fight the men of Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr there. According to another report, the amount sent to him by al-Muʿtaḍid was ten million dirhams. Part of it was sent by al-Muʿtaḍid from Baghdad. He wrote to the officials of al-Jabal, ordering them to give the rest of it to the emissaries.

In Rajab, 288 (June 21-July 20, 901), Badr, the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, drew close to Fārs. The associates of Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad who were there withdrew. Badr's men entered Fārs, and his officials collected the land tax there.

On Ramaḍān 2, 288 (August 20, 901), a dispatch from ʿAjj b. Ḥājj,[483] the governor of Mecca, reportedly arrived at Baghdad. ʿAjj mentioned in it that the Banū Yaʿfur[484] had attacked a man who had seized control of Ṣanʿā'. He suggested[485] that he was an ʿAlid and that they had routed him.[486] He had then taken refuge in a city, fortifying himself there. When they got to him, they attacked him and routed him again, capturing a son of his;[487] he escaped [481] Read bi-rasā'il as in R. The text has bi-khilaʿ "with robes of honors," following the text of Ibn al-Athīr.

---

[482] Corselets and crowns were expensive gifts also sent on occasion to ʿAmr b. al-Layth. See Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 40, 45. Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 201, ed. Pellat, V, 170, describes the gifts as "a corselet of brocade woven with gold and studded with jewels, a gold belt studded with jewels, and other jewels, as well as three hundred thousand dīnārs (!)."

[483] He was amīr of Mecca in 281 (894-5). See Wüstenfeld, Chroniken, I, 342. He died in 306 (918). See above, n. 401.

[484] On the Banu Yaʿfur in the Yemen, see Zambaur, 116. For this particular episode, see also Ibn al-Muʿtazz (verses 377-86). The Arabic lexicographers suggest different vocalizations for Yaʿfur. Yuʿfir is the one adopted in EI², Suppl., s. v. al-Hādī ila 'l-Ḥaḳḳ.

[485] R: wa-zaʿama; B: "mentioned."

[486] R: "routed his men."

[487] Presumably, the ʿAlid was the Qarmaṭian ʿAlī b. al-Faḍl [d. 303 (915)]. See Kay, Yaman, 207, and below, nn. 751 and 818. It seems, however, that Ṭabarī's statement cannot be fully clarified by means of the ample information we have about the turbulent events that took place in Ṣanʿā' in 288-9. In these events, Yaḥyā al-Hādī ilā al-Ḥaqq, the founder of Zaydī rule in the Yemen, also played a prominent role. See van Arendonk, Opkomst, 191ff.; EI², Suppl., s. v. al-Hādī ila 'l-Ḥaḳḳ.

with about fifty persons. The Banū Yaʿfur entered Ṣanʿāʾ and mentioned al-Muʿtaḍid in the Friday sermon there.

In this year, Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj with a few men attacked his nephew // Dēwdād b. Muḥammad, who had the army of his [2205] father Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj with him. Yūsuf routed[488] Dēwdād's army, leaving the latter with only a small number of people. He suggested to him that he stay with him, but Dēwdād refused, saying that he would go to the Caliph's court. (Yūsuf) started to go along with him for a while and to ask him to stay with him, but he refused[489] and took the Mosul Road. He reached Baghdad on Thursday, Ramaḍān 23, 288 (Thursday, September 10, 901). The battle between the two had taken place in the region of Ādharbayjān.

In this year, Nizār b. Muḥammad,[490] the agent of al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī Kūrah, went on the summer campaign, conquering many Byzantine fortresses. He brought into Ṭarsūs some one hundred and sixty non-Muslims, [491] abbots,[492] and deacons as well as many of their crosses and banners. Kūrah sent them on to Baghdad.

On Dhū al-Ḥijjah 12, 288 (November 27, 901), letters of the merchants reached Baghdad from al-Raqqah stating that the Byzantines had arrived in many vessels. Some Byzantines had also come on (horse)back to the region of Kaysūm.[493] They had driven off more than fifteen thousand Muslims, men, women, and children. They had left with them, including some protected non-Muslims they had seized.

---

[488] R: fa-hazama, also Miskawayh, Tajārib V, 18.

[489] The addition in R is also found in Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 18.

[490] Apparently, the individual who was removed from the administration of the Ḥaramayn in 310 (923) (Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 31) and died in 317 (929-30) (ʿArīb, 146, where he is called Abū Maʿadd al-Ṭabbī). See below, n. 713.

[491] The contemptous term (ʿilj), referring to the native non-Muslim population, is translated "Barbares chrétiens" by Canard, Sources arabes, 17.

[492] The context refers to church dignitaries, and R has the expected al-qamāmisah, from Greek hēgoumenos.

[493] See Honigmann, Ostgrenze, index, s. v. Kaēsoun.

In this year, the men of Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī came close to al-Baṣrah. The inhabitants were so afraid of them that they thought of fleeing and moving away. However, their governor forbade them to do that.

At the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 288 (December 15, 901),[494] Waṣīf, the eunuch of Ibn Abī al-Sāj, was killed. His corpse was taken and hung on the East Side. According to another report, he was not killed but died (of natural causes), and after he had died, his head was cut off.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was Abū Bakr Hārūn b.
[2206] Muḥammad.[495] / /

[494] In his more detailed report, Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 202f., ed. Pellat, V, 170f., gives the date of Thursday, al-Muḥarram 1, 289 (Wednesday, December 16, 901).

[495] According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, IX, 75, ed. Pellat, V, 299, he was Hārūn b. Muḥammad (Muḥammad b. Hārūn ?) b. al-ʿAbbās b. Ibrāhīm b. ʿĪsā b. Jaʿfar b. Abī Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr, a great-great-great-grandson of the Caliph al-Manṣūr. If the pedigree is correct, Hārūn b. Muḥammad could not have been a son of the leader of the pilgrimage in 280. The latter's son and successor, moreover, was called Abū Jaʿfar (see Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, III, 356).

The Important Events of[496] the Year 289

(DECEMBER 16, 901 - DECEMBER 4, 902)

One of the events was the spread of the Qarmaṭian movement in the Kūfan countryside. Shibl,[497] a page of Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Ṭā'ī, was sent against them. He was ordered to search for them, seize all of them that he might come upon, and bring them[498] to the Caliph's court. He came upon a leader of theirs, known as Ibn Abī al-Qaws.[499] He was sent with the others to Baghdad. On al-Muḥarram 22, 289, (January 8, 902), al-Muʿtaḍid summoned him and interrogated him. He then ordered his teeth knocked out. Thereafter, his (limbs) were dislocated by stretching one of his hands with a pulley while a rock was attached to the other hand.[500] He was left in this state from midday to evening.[501] The next day, his hands and feet were cut off, and he was decapitated. His corpse was hung on the East Side. After several days, it was carried to al-Yāsiriyyah,[502] where it was hung together with the Qarmaṭians who had been hung there.

---

[496] R: al-aḥdāth al-jalīlah; B: "matters."

[497] I have not succeeded in finding any further information about him.

[498] Both manuscripts, R and B, have wa-ḥamlihī. Ḥamlihim in the Leiden edition may be a misprint. The meaning is the same.

[499] The reading al-Fawāris adopted in the Leiden edition has very little authority. It is not found in either of the Ṭabarī manuscripts. R has al-Faws. In Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 204f., 422, ed. Pellat, V, 171f., it is merely an editorial choice. It does appear in Ibn al-Athīr and in al-ʿUyūn wa-al-Ḥadā'iq, ed. Dāwūd, I, 169, ed. Saʿīdī, I, 100. Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 18, has al-Qaws, and, above all, Ibn al-Muʿtazz, verse 413, also has al-Qaws. It would seem that the reading al-Fawāris is merely a substitution of a more common name for an unfamiliar one (which, moreover, could be Faws or Qaws). Not surprisingly, no further information about the individual seems to be available.

[500] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 18; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 126, make the procedure a little clearer. A rock was attached to one hand, and a pulley string to the other.

[501] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 18: "three hours."

[502] See Lassner, Topography, 259, n. 62.

On Rabīʿ I 2, 289 (February 14, 902), those whose houses and shops were at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah were evicted from them. They were told to take what they could salvage[503] and leave. This was because al-Muʿtaḍid thought of building himself a palace there to live in. He had the foundation lines traced at the place where the wall was to be built and excavated part of the area. He began with the construction of a pavillion[504] along the Tigris. He had ordered its construction so that he could move into it, remaining there until the construction of the palace and castle was completed.

On Monday[505] night [Rabīʿ II 289 (Monday, April 5, 902)], [2207] al-Muʿtaḍid died. // The following morning, Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb, Abū Khāzim ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz,[506] and Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb[507] were brought to the Caliph's palace[508] The funeral prayer was attended by the wazīr al-Qāsim

---

[503] Text: aqfāṣakum; read anqāḍakum, as in R and Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 30, l. 14. Anqāḍ refers to things that were still usable or saleable after a building was torn down. See, for instance, text above, III, 320, 385; Maqrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, I, 325, 327; Dozy, II, 714. Aqfāṣakum, as in the Leiden edition, may not even have been intended in B; if it constitutes an acceptable reading, it may mean "your cages" in the sense of containers in which the merchandise (and other belongings) were kept. See text above, III, 193 (aṣḥāb al-aqfāṣ), and 279 (darb al-aqfāṣ).

[504] For dakkah meaning "raised platform," see text below, 2244f. Here, an inhabitable construction is meant.

[505] Al-ithnayn is indeed found in R as expected. The night from Sunday to Monday is meant. Al-Muʿtaḍid thus died on Sunday, April 4. See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 113, ed. Pellat, V, 137. Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿah, ʿUyūn, I, 231, l. 31, mentions "the night of (Monday to) Tuesday."

[506] According to Wakīʿ, Akhbār al-quḍāh, III, 198, Abū Khāzim succeeded Ibrāhīm b. Isḥāq b. Abī al-ʿAnbas as qāḍī of al-Kūfah when Ibn Abī al-ʿAnbas died in 275-6 (888-9) [in fact, he died on Tuesday, Rabīʿ II 26, 277 (Monday, August 17, 890), as indicated in Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, VI, 25f.]. Abū Khāzim was then named qāḍī of al-Sharqiyyah in Baghdad and continued at the same time as qāḍī of al-Kūfah until his death in 272 [sic, read 292 (905), see the obituary notice in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 52-56; Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 236, ed. Pellat, V, 187, gives the exact date, although the day of the month must be corrected from seventh to ninth, that is, Thursday, Jumādā II 9, 292 (Thursday, April 18, 905)]. Instead of Abū Khāzim, one often finds Abū Ḥāzim, but the former seems to be the preferred form of the name.

[507] See above, n. 217. The task of the three judges was the preparation of the death certificate.

[508] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 24, ll. 1f., supplies here what is no doubt a homoioteleuton omission in the manuscript tradition of Ṭabarī: "The washing of al-Muʿtaḍid was supervised by Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, and the funeral prayer for him by Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb."

b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān, Abū Khāzim, Abū ʿUmar,[509] the eunuchs,[510] and the inner circle of notables. Al-Muʿtaḍid had stipulated in his last will that he wished to be buried in the house of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.[511] A grave was dug for him there. He was carried from his palace which was known as al-Ḥasanī, during the night and buried in his grave there.

On Rabīʿ II 22, 289 (April 6, 902), al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān sat in the Caliph's Ḥasanī Palace and permitted people to come in to express to him their condolences on the death of al-Muʿtaḍid and to congratulate him on his new ruler, al-Muktafī. He ordered the civilian and military officials to renew the oath of allegiance to al-Muktafī, and they did so.[512] [509] Both Muḥammad and his father Yūsuf probably attended.

---

[510] Text: al-ḥaram "the harem"; read al-khadam as in R. The latter reading appears to be preferable. The two words are frequently paired.

[511] See above, n. 417. Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, IV, 407, l. 8, specifies " the marble chamber" of the house. See also verse 3 of the elegy of Ibn al-Muʿtazz, Dīwān, IV, 133.

[512] As indicated in the Leiden edition, Ibn Abī Uṣaybiʿah, ʿUyūn, I, 231, ll. 19-30, quotes a medical anecdote in connection with the death of al-Muʿtaḍid on the authority of the History of Ṭabarī. There is no real reason to doubt that it belonged to a recension of the work. It may, at some stage, have been omitted by Ṭabarī himself, or the compiler of a recension, as too anecdotal and irrelevant:

"As the story goes, the physicians Dāwūd b. Daylam [d. Saturday, al-Muḥarram 5, 329 (Saturday, October 10, 940), see Ibn Abī ʿUṣaybiʿah, ʿUyūn, I, 234] and ʿAbdūs (in whose biography the quotation from Ṭabarī appears; see Ullmann, Die Medizin im Islam, 302) have said: When al-Muʿtaḍid's illness became grave—it was a sort of dropsy and corrupt temper, from which he was getting away (?)—and he feared for his life, we and all the other physicians were brought into his presence. He said to us, 'Don't you say that when a disease is known, the remedy is known, and when a patient is given that remedy, he gets better?' When we gave an affirmative answer, he continued, 'So, do you know my illness and the remedy for it, or don't you?' We said we knew it, and he said, 'So, why am I not getting better under your treatment?' We thought that he was about to attack us, and our strength ebbed. ʿAbdūs said to him, 'O Commander of the Faithful, we do have the right idea just as stated, but there is a problem. We do not know the quantity of the parts of the illness so as to be able to match them with like parts of the remedy. We are just guessing at it. We try at the start and see what comes closest, and then we look what effect it has upon the illness, if God wills.' Al-Muʿtaḍid let us be, and when we were alone, we held a conference and concluded that we should put him in a ghābah, i. e., an oven. We heated it up and placed him into it (see text above, III, 1363). He sweated, and he felt some relief, because the illness withdrew inside his body. Then, however, it went up to his heart. After several days, he died, and we escaped from our dangerous predicament."

The Caliphate of al-Muktafī bi-llāh[513]

When al-Muʿtaḍid died, al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh immediately sent off dispatches with the information to al-Muktafī who was staying in al-Raqqah. Upon receiving the news, al-Muktafī ordered his secretary al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr al-Naṣrānī the very same day to exact the oath of allegiance from all those in his camp and to pay them a bonus. Al-Ḥusayn did that. Al-Muktafī sent men to the regions of Diyār Rabīʿah, Diyār Muḍar, and the west to maintain order and then left al-Raqqah for Baghdad. On Tuesday, Jumādā I // 8, 289 (Tuesday, April 20, 902), al-Muktafī entered his Ḥasanī [2208] Palace. When he arrived at his residence, he ordered the destruction of the dungeons for criminals which his father had constructed for himself.[514] The very same day, al-Muktafī addressed al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh by his patronymic (Abū al-Ḥusayn, as a sign of intimacy) and bestowed a robe of honor upon him.

The very same day,[515] ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār died. He was buried the next morning near the Ḥasanī Palace. When he was dying and could no longer speak, al-Muʿtaḍid reportedly ordered Ṣāfī al-Ḥuramī[516] through signs and gestures to kill ʿAmr; he did this by putting his hand upon his neck and his eye[517] to indicate that he should slaughter[518] the one-eyed man. But Ṣāfī, knowing 513 Rubric supplied in the Leiden edition. It is not found in R.

---

514 See text above, n. 345. Quoting this text, Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, VI, 429, has "dug for himself (iḥtafarahā)."

515 Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 24: "On the second day after his arrival."

516 Ṣāfī al-Ḥuramī d. Shaʿbān, 298 (April-May, 911). See Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 9; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 108. The vocalization Ḥuramī is expressly indicated in Dhahabī, Mushtabih, I, 159.

517 R: " his eyes," which is a wrong reading.

518 R (and similarly Miskawayh and Ibn al-Athīr): an idhbaḥ, for arāda dhabḥ. Quoting this text, Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, VI, 429f., adds that "ʿAmr was one-eyed," but this fact does not seem to be stated elsewhere.

that al-Muʿtaḍid was near death, was unwilling to kill ʿAmr and did not do it. When al-Muktafī entered Baghdad, he reportedly asked al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh whether ʿAmr was still alive, and was happy when al-Qāsim replied that he was. The Caliph mentioned that he wanted to treat ʿAmr well, since ʿAmr had given him presents and shown much kindness to him when he stayed in al-Raqqah. Al-Muktafī now wanted to recompense him. Al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh reportedly disliked that[519] and clandestinely sent someone to kill ʿAmr.

On Rajab 26, 289 (July 6, 902), word arrived at Baghdad that a number of inhabitants of al-Rayy had entered into correspondence with Muḥammad b. Hārūn. He had been appointed governor of Ṭabaristān by Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad, after he had killed Muḥammad b. Zayd al-ʿAlawī, but he had then seceded and chosen the color white.[520] Now, those people asked him to come to al-Rayy, so that they might bring him into the city (to take charge of it). This was because Ukratmush al-Turkī,[521] who was in charge of the city, reportedly behaved badly toward them. Ukratmush fought against Muḥammad b. Hārūn,[522] but Muḥam-[2209] mad routed and killed him, / / two sons of his, and an officer of the central authorities called Abrūn,[523] a brother of Kayghalagh. Muḥammad b. Hārūn entered al-Rayy and took control of it.

In Rajab, 289 (June 11-July 10, 902), Baghdad was shaken by earthquakes which lasted many days and nights.

In this year, Badr, the page of al-Muʿtaḍid, was killed. This was the reason why he was killed: al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh had thought of transferring the caliphate, after al-Muʿtaḍid's death,

---

519 Ibn Khallikān: "his asking about him."

520 For the color white (here to indicate pro-Shīʿah sentiment) as against the ʿAbbāsid black, in connection with Muḥammad b. Hārūn, see also Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 194f., ed. Pellat, V, 167. For white used by the Qarmaṭians, see text below, 2264. See also Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, II, 51.

521 That is, Öğretmiş, see Spuler, Iran in früh-islamischer Zeit, 82; Massignon, *Passion*², I, 472.

522 Or, "M. fought against U."

523 See text above, III, 1936, where Abrūn was in charge of Qazwīn in 266 (879-80); Massignon, *Passion*², I, 472. For the sons of Kayghalagh, see below, n. 677. For Kayghalagh, see text above, III, 1819, sub anno 256 (870).

to someone who was not one of al-Muʿtaḍid's sons. He had discussed the matter with Badr,[524] and Badr had refused, saying, "I am not willing to take the caliphate away from the sons of my master to whom I owe my success." Al-Qāsim realized that he would be unable to oppose Badr, since Badr was the commander of al-Muʿtaḍid's army and controlled his affairs, while enjoying the loyalty of his eunuchs and pages. Thus, when he saw Badr's attitude, he came to fear and hate him.

Now, when death came to al-Muʿtaḍid, Badr was in Fārs.[525] Al-Qāsim took all the official steps necessary for al-Muktafī in al-Raqqah to become caliph. He did so because of the estrangement that existed between Badr and al-Muktafī, when his father al-Muʿtaḍid was alive. From al-Muʿtaḍid's pages he exacted the oath of allegiance to al-Muktafī as caliph and informed al-Muktafī by letter about his action. When al-Muktafī arrived in Baghdad, Badr was still in Fārs, and al-Qāsim worked toward Badr's destruction. He did this reportedly in order to protect himself lest Badr approach al-Muktafī and inform him about al-Qāsim's idea, while al-Muʿtaḍid was alive, of diverting the caliphate from al-Muʿtaḍid's sons / / upon his death. [2210]

Al-Muktafī reportedly sent Muḥammad b. Kumushjūr[526] and a number of officers with messages and dispatches for the officers who were with Badr, ordering them to break away from Badr and come to him. The dispatches were transmitted to the officers in question. Yānis,[527] the eunuch of al-Muwaffaq, was sent against Badr with ten million dirhams to be distributed as bonuses to Badr's men, so that they would give the oath of allegiance to al-Muktafī. Yānis left with the money, but when he reached al-Ahwāz, Badr reportedly sent someone who seized the money from him, whereupon Yānis returned to Madīnat al-Salām. When

---

524 Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 25, adds, no doubt following a Ṭabarī recension, "after he had sworn him to secrecy."

525 Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 25, mentions here for the first time the reason why Badr was in Fārs, as stated in the text above, III, 2203: "because he had been sent out to fight Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. al-Layth who had usurped control over Fārs." This statement may go back to a homoioteleuton omission in the text of Ṭabarī, rather than an attempt by Miskawayh to make up for his earlier omission.

526 R: "Kushmard." See above, n. 398.

527 Yānis al-Muwaffaqī, d. 311 (923-4). See ʿArīb, 115f. His mausoleum is mentioned by Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 146, sub anno 344 (945-6). See, further, for instance, Eclipse, I, 74; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 187; Mottahedeh, Loyalty, 87.

al-Muktafī's dispatches reached the officers attached to Badr, a number of them left Badr and departed for Madīnat al-Salām, among them al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr al-Ghanawī, Khāqān al-Mufliḥī, Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundāj, Khafīf al-Adhkūtakīnī, and a number of others. When they reached Madīnat al-Salām, they went to al-Muktafī who reportedly bestowed robes of honor upon some eighty[528] of them and gave each of their leaders one hundred thousand dirhams. He gave less to others; he bestowed robes of honor upon some officers but did not give them any money.

In Rajab, 289 (June 11-July 10, 902), Badr departed intending to go to Wāsiṭ. When al-Muktafī learned that Badr was going to Wāsiṭ, he sequestered Badr's house and arrested a number of his pages and officers, whom he incarcerated, among them Niḥrīr the Elder,[529] Gharīb al-Jabalī,[530] and Manṣūr,[531] a son of the sister of ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī. Al-Muktafī had the officers[532] brought to him and told them that he would not appoint anyone as their amīr and that whoever needed something should meet with the wazīr, [2211] as he had already ordered him to take care of their needs. // He ordered Badr's name erased from shields and banners which bore the inscription "Abū al-Najm, the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid bi-llāh."[533]

Badr wrote a letter to al-Muktafī. He entrusted it to Rundāq al-Saʿīdī[534] and dispatched him on swift camels. When the letter reached al-Muktafī, he took it, put someone in charge of that Rundāq, and had al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī Kūrah march with an army on Wāsiṭ. Al-Muktafī reportedly sent him ahead and then sent Muḥammad b. Yūsuf down on the evening of Shaʿbān 28, 289 (August 7, 902), with a message for Badr.

---

528 Text: "thirty." Read "eighty" as in RC, also Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 26.

529 Perhaps the Niḥrīr mentioned above, III, 1709f., sub anno 255 (869). Note, however, that the events are some thirty-five years removed.

530 The form of the name of this otherwise unknown individual is uncertain.

531 I have no further information about him.

532 Apparently, those mentioned earlier who had defected.

533 For this practice, see text above, III, 2115. Badr's kunyah Abū al-Najm is not often mentioned. See Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 199, 201. Note that Badr "Full Moon" had a son Hilāl "New Moon" and a patronymic containing a word for "star" (najm). This was not uncommon.

534 Text: Zaydān; read Rundāq as in RC as well as Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCXCIX. Nothing further is known about him.

Al-Muktafī had sent a message[535] to Badr when he left the administration of Fārs, offering him the governorship of any region he wanted, be it Iṣbahān or al-Rayy or al-Jibāl. He ordered him to go wherever he desired in these regions with whatever horsemen and foot soldiers he desired, and to stay there with them as governor. Badr refused saying, "It is absolutely necessary for me to go to the court of my master."[536] Al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh found an occasion to speak to al-Muktafī about him and said to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, we have offered to appoint Badr governor wherever he would want to go, but he refuses, wanting only to come to your court." He made al-Muktafī afraid of an attack by Badr upon him and urged the Caliph to meet Badr and fight him.[537]

When it was reported to Badr that his house had been sequestered and that his pages and associates had been incarcerated, he was certain that there was evil afoot. He sent someone to attempt to free his son Hilāl[538] and have him brought down to him. Al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh became aware of the attempt and ordered Hilāl guarded. He summoned Abū Khāzim, // the qāḍī of [2212] al-Sharqiyyah, and ordered him to go to Badr. He was to meet with him, make him feel secure, and grant him a guarantee of safe-conduct from the Commander of the Faithful. The guarantee would be for himself and his son and would cover his property. Abū Khāzim reportedly told al-Qāsim that he needed to hear this directly from the Commander of the Faithful, so that he could transmit it to Badr on the Caliph's authority. Al-Qāsim told him to go back and wait until he could obtain permission for him to 535 If the date just indicated is correct, it gives the date of the departure from Baghdad of the qāḍī Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, which is described later in much detail, and the message must be one sent earlier to Badr. Ṭabarī here clearly combines different reports on the sad event which at the time as well as later touched people deeply.

---

536 The use of the word mawlā "master" recalls Badr's status under al-Muʿtaḍid, an implication that would not have escaped the men around the new Caliph.

537 Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 26, adds, no doubt from a Ṭabarī recension: "saying that he has openly shown his disloyalty."

538 Hilāl b. Badr was not an uncommon name at the time, but if Ibn al-ʿAdīm is correct in speaking of "Hilāl b. Badr, Abū al-Fatḥ, the page of al-Muʿtaḍid" (Zubdat al-ḥalab, ed. al-Dahhān, I, 96), Badr's son survived and became amīr of Damascus, then governor of Aleppo, in 316 (928) and, following that, governor of Quṭrabbul and Sāmarrā in 317 (929). The sources which would allow checking this information are not available to me.

go and see the Commander of the Faithful on this matter. However, he then summoned Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad b. Yūsuf and gave him the same order that he had given to Abū Khāzim. Abū ʿUmar accepted right away, and al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh gave him a letter of safe-conduct for Badr from al-Muktafī. Abū ʿUmar left with it for Badr.[539]

When Badr left Wāsiṭ, he was deserted by his men and by most of his pages, such as ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī, his son-in-law Yānis al-Musta'min,[540] Aḥmad b. Simʿān,[541] and Niḥrīr the Younger.[542] They went to al-Muktafī's tent to ask for guarantees of safe-conduct. On Ramaḍān 2, 289 (August 10, 902), al-Muktafī left Baghdad for his tent on the Diyālā River, accompanied by his entire army. He encamped there and bestowed robes of honor upon the group of men I have named, who had come to his tent, as well as a number of officers and troops. He placed a number of others in custody. Following this he had nine of them put in fetters and ordered them taken in fetters to the New Prison.

Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad b. Yūsuf reportedly met Badr near Wāsiṭ. He handed the letter of safe-conduct to him and informed him, on al-Muktafī's authority, about what al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh had told him. He then went up with Badr (toward Baghdad) in the latter's skiff. He had him travel hugging the east bank (of the Tigris),[543] while those of his pages who had remained with him, together with a number of troops and a large number of [2213] Kurds and people of al-Jabal, accompanied him along // the bank of the Tigris. There was an understanding between Badr and Abū ʿUmar that Badr would enter Baghdad willingly and obediently. Badr crossed the Tigris and reached al-Nuʿmāniyyah, where he ordered those of his pages and men who had remained

---

[539] As a judge, Abū ʿUmar was not likely to become knowingly involved in this sort of illegal politicking. Through his and his father's long association with al-Muʿtaḍid, and his awareness of Badr's position, he may have felt that Badr was in no danger, and he thus had no suspicions as Abū Khāzim did.

[540] The relationship by marriage apparently existed between Yānis and al-Nūsharī, and not between Yānis and Badr. There does not seem to be any further information about this Yānis, and it is not clear whether al-Musta'min is a nickname or descriptive.

[541] Aḥmad b. Simʿān is mentioned in Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 190.

[542] Niḥrīr the Younger died in 318 (930) holding the position of chief of security in Mosul. See ʿArīb, 146.

[543] See text above, III, 1893, where essentially the same localities are named as here.

with him to give up their weapons and abstain from any fighting; he also informed them about the letter of safe-conduct which Abū ʿUmar had brought him. While he was moving along, Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundāj[544] arrived in a barge with a number of pages. Having transferred to the skiff, he was asked by Badr what was going on. He calmed Badr and talked kindly to him, and all the while everybody addressed Badr as amīr. It was, however, al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh who had sent Ibn Kundāj, telling him to let him know when he got together with Badr in one place. He now did so, whereupon al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh summoned Lu'lu',[545] one of the Caliph's pages, and told him that he had selected him for a job. When Lu'lu' replied that he was ready and willing, al-Qāsim said to him, "Go and take Badr from Ibn Kundājīq and bring his head to me!" Lu'lu' sailed in a flyer[546] until he caught up with Badr and those with him between Sīb Banī Kūmā and Aḍṭarbad.[547] He transferred from the flyer to the skiff and told Badr to get up. When Badr asked what was going on, Lu'lu' replied that no harm would come to him. He had him transferred to the flyer and traveled along with him until they came to an island at al-Ṣāfiyah. He took him out to the island and disembarked with him. He then called for a sword which he had with him, and unsheathed it. Now Badr was certain that he would be killed. He asked Lu'lu' to give him time to pray two rakʿahs. Lu'lu' granted him the delay, and Badr prayed two rakʿahs. Then Lu'lu' had him step forward and decapitated him. This // was before noon on Friday, Ramadān 6, 289 (Saturday, [2214] August 14, 902).[548] Lu'lu' took Badr's head, returned to the flyer, and went back with the head to the encampment of al-Muktafī at the Diyālā River.

---

544 R and Miskawayh (Tajārib, V, 28): "Kundāījīq."

545 He appears to be known only from this report, unless he was identical with the Lu'lu' mentioned in the text below, 2241. Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 28, speaks of him as one of the noble (nujabāʾ) pages. As a newcomer, he had little choice but to accept what was clearly an unsavory and potentially risky assignment.

546 Another type of boat, commonly translated as above.

547 Described in text above, III, 1893, as located between al-Sīb and Dayr al-ʿĀqūl. The vocalization is uncertain and is seemingly not indicated in the sources. The text in B reads: wa-man-maʿahū fa-laqiyahum bayn..." and those who were with him. Then he met them..."

548 The poem which follows this account confirms that the killing took place on Friday.

Badr's corpse was left where it was and remained there. Later his family sent someone secretly to get his corpse. They placed it in a casket and concealed it in their house. During the pilgrimage season, they reportedly carried it to Mecca and buried it there, as he had stipulated in his last will. Before he was killed, he had manumitted all his slaves. After his death, the central authorities took over his estates, farms, houses, and all that he owned.

On Ramaḍān 7, 289 (August 15, 902), the killing of Badr was reported to al-Muktafī. He rode back to Madīnat al-Salām accompanied by the troops that were with him. Badr's head had been brought to him and had reached him before he left his place of encampment. He ordered it cleansed and placed[549] in the treasury.[550]

On Monday, Ramaḍān 8, 289 (Monday, August 16, 902), the qāḍī Abū ʿUmar went back to his house saddened and grieved by his role in the affair. People talked about him and said that it was he who had caused Badr's death. They composed poems about Abū ʿUmar such as:

(1) Ask the qāḍī of the City of al-Manṣūr:
On what grounds did you allow the taking of the amīr's head,
(2) After he was given solemn assurances and Declarations under oath[551] in an official patent?
(3) Where are your oaths—which God attests
Are the oaths of a wicked man—
(4) That your hands would not let go
[2215] His, until he sees the occupant of the throne? / /
(5) You shameless person and greatest liar
In the community, you perjurer!

---

549 R: fa-jaʿalūhā" and they placed it."

550 Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 29, specifies "treasury of heads." For this term, see, for instance, Ṣafadī, Wāfī, X, 378, l. 19.

551 Amān "safe conduct" appears in authors quoting the verses but may be a simplification. At any rate, Ṭabarī can be assumed to have had aymān "oaths."

(6) This is not what judges do and the like of it is just
Not done by those in charge of the bridges.[552]
(7) What did you do on that splendid
Friday in the best of all months!
(8) The one whom you have killed went in Ramaḍān
Fasting after prostration in the dust.[553]
(9) O Banū Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb! The people of Baghdad have been deceived by you.
(10) May God confound you and may He let me see
You humiliated during the lifetime of this wazīr![554]
(11) Thus prepare for your reply to the Just Judge after Munkar and Nakīr![555]
(12) All of you be ransom for Abū
Khāzim who is straight in every respect.

On Ramaḍān 9,[556] 289 (August 17, 902), Rundāq al-Saʿīdī, who had earlier been sent as a messenger by Badr to al-Muktafī, together with the nine officers who had been put in fetters, and seven others of Badr's men who had been seized after them, was carried in a ship's hold[557] to al-Baṣrah, where they all were detained in the Baṣrah prison.

Lu'lu', who was charged with Badr's killing, was reportedly a page of Muḥammad b. Hārūn who had killed Muḥammad b.

---

552 Wulāt al-jusūr is meant to be parallel to "judges" and refers to the high ranking officials in charge of the maintenance of the bridges and the supervision of the bridge traffic. See text above, III, 1727, 2185 (appointment of Ṣāliḥ al-Amīn to the position); text above, III, 2027, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, VII, 345 (speaking of Abū al-ʿAbbās Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir); Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 259, ed. Pellat, V, 197 (in a verse of a poem by Ibn Bassām al-Bassāmī which has tawallā al-jusūra, quoted, however, by other authors as tawallā al-ʿIrāqa). The plural "bridges" may, in fact, be poetical license for the dual indicating the two main bridges of Baghdad usually referred to in this connection.

553 Sajdat al-taʿfīr is an allusion to a ḥadīth, see Concordance, IV, 282b60ff. In Masʿūdī, Murūj, verse 8 precedes verse 7.

554 "After the humiliation of the wazīr" in Masʿūdī, Murūj, may be a simplification. In fact, the poet suggests that the wazīr's life will come to a speedy end, and Abū ʿUmar will be humiliated as speedily.

555 Abū ʿUmar will have to justify his action before God on the Last Day, after having undergone in the grave the painful inquisition by the two angels, Munkar and Nakīr.

556 Text: "seven"; read "nine" as in R, since the event is likely to have taken place after Badr's execution. "This year (289)," omitted in the edition, is found in BR.

557 Safīnah muṭabba/iqah or muṭba/iqah (see Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 295, 359) seems to refer to a covered boat with a hold suitable for transporting prisoners (as in muṭbi/aq "prison" ?).

Zayd in Ṭabaristān and Ukratmush in al-Rayy. He had come to the central authorities in Baghdad to ask for a guarantee of safe-conduct together with a number of Muḥammad b. Hārūn's pages.

On Monday night, Ramaḍān 16, 289 (Tuesday, August 24, 902), [2216] // ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. Abī Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq[558] was reportedly killed. When he was arrested, his mother reportedly sent a nurse of his with him to the house of Mu'nis.[559] He was separated from the nurse, while she remained there for two or three days and was then sent back to the residence of her mistress, the mother of ʿAbd al-Wāḥid. The latter was told, whenever she asked about him, that he was in the palace of al-Muktafī and in good health. She hoped that he would stay alive; but when al-Muktafī died, she gave up and held a wake for him.

⌜The Rest of the Important Developments that took Place during the Year 289 (902)⌝[560]

One of the events was a dispatch which reached the central authorities in Baghdad from Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad, the ruler of Khurāsān, on Shaʿbān 20, 289 (June 30, 902). The dispatch contained the information that a battle had taken place in Ṭabaristān between the men of Ismāʿīl b. Ahmad and Ibn Justān al-Daylamī.[561] In the battle, Ismāʿīl's men routed Ibn Justān. The dispatch of Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad was read in the two Friday Mosques of Baghdad.

---

[558] According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 227ff., ed. Pellat, V, 183f., ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was a rather unimportant and immoral young man. His pension, as well as that of his sisters, is mentioned by Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 25; Busse, "Hofbudget," 27.

[559] According to Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 227f., ed. Pellat, V, 183, it was the house of Mu'nis al-Faḥl, that is, Mu'nis al-Khāzin. He was named al-faḥl in order to distinguish him from all those many eunuchs named Mu'nis, see Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 374, 11. 8f.

[560] The rubric is found in neither R nor C. It owes its existence in B to the fact that at this point a new part of the parts into which the History was divided had its beginning.

[561] See text above, III, 1285f.

In this year, after Badr had been killed, one of his men called Isḥāq al-Farghānī[562] went to the desert region together with a number of his men to oppose the central authorities. A battle took place there between him and Abū al-Agharr in which Abū al-Agharr was routed and a number of his men and officers were killed. Thereafter Mu'nis al-Khāzin was sent with a large army to al-Kūfah to fight Isḥāq al-Farghānī. // [2217]

At the end of Dhū al-Qa'dah, 289 (November 5, 902), a robe of honor was bestowed upon Khāqān al-Mufliḥī, and he was put in charge of security in al-Rayy. Five thousand men were attached to him.

In this year, a man who had gathered an army of Arab tribesmen and others appeared in Syria. He went with his men to Damascus where Ṭughj b. Juff was in charge of security on behalf of Hārūn b. Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn. This was at the end of the year 289 (December 4, 902). Many people were reportedly killed in the numerous battles that took place between Ṭughj and him.

A report on the man who appeared in Syria and on the reason for his appearance there

Zikrawayh b. Mihrawayh was, as we have mentioned, the dā'ī of Qarmaṭ.[563] When al-Mu'taḍid constantly sent armies against the Qarmaṭians in the Kūfan countryside and persevered in their pursuit, causing them severe losses, Zikrawayh saw that the Qarmaṭians would not be able to defend themselves or find help from the inhabitants of the Sawād. He therefore worked hard at inveigling the Asad, Ṭayyi', Tamīm, and other Arab tribes who lived near al-Kūfah. He tried to convert them to his views and suggested to them that if they were to respond to his call, the Qarmaṭians in the Sawād would join them in his cause. However, they did not respond to his efforts. A number of the Kalb were [562] No further information about him seems to be available.

[563] See EI[2], s. v. Ḳarmaṭī. Ṭabarī refers the reader back to III, 2127f. For a revaluation of Ṭabarī's information on the sons of Zikrawayh and their relation to Egyptian Fāṭimid history, see Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs."

protecting[564] the desert road at al-Samāwah, which was located between al-Kūfah and Damascus on the Palmyra Road, and at other places. Their occupation was to move messengers and merchant goods on their camels. Zikrawayh now sent his sons to them. They pledged allegiance to them and mingled among [2218] them, / / claiming descent from Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar.[565] They mentioned that they were afraid of the central authorities and were seeking refuge with them. The Kalb accepted them on this basis.

The sons of Zikrawayh then made surreptitious propaganda for the views of the Qarmaṭians among them, but none of the Kalbites accepted their views, except a subtribe known as the Banū al-ʿUllayṣ b. Ḍamḍam b. ʿAdī b. Janāb,[566] and especially their *mawlā*s. At the end of the year 289 (December 4, 902), they declared allegiance to a son of Zikrawayh named Abū al-Qāsim Yaḥyā in the region of al-Samāwah. They nicknamed him al-Shaykh, a nickname he had given himself because of something he had attempted to do among them.[567] He asserted to them that he was Abū[568] ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad. ⌜According to another report,⌝ he asserted that he was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Yaḥyā,[569] and again, that he was Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad⌝ b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib—although Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl reportedly had no son called ʿAbdallāh.[570] He asserted to them that his father, who was known as Abū Maḥmūd, was a dāʿī of his[571] and that he had one hundred 564 That is, they extorted money from those using the road, as in the text above, III, 2190, and as explained in III, 1010.

---

565 The abstruse ʿAlid pedigrees claimed by the Qarmaṭian leaders tend to connect them with the Ismāʿīlī (Sevener) Shīʿah and the Egyptian Fāṭimids. See also Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs," 34.

566 For the ʿUllayṣ, a subdivision of the ʿAbdallāh b. Kināanah/Kalb, see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, table 282; II, 567b.

567 I do not know of any explanation of this statement.

568 R: "Ibn."

569 Was this Yaḥyā the son of the fifth imām Zayd, or the grandson of Yaḥyā b. Zayd who was killed in al-Kūfah in 250 (864) and had once attempted a minor, abortive uprising in 235 (849-50)?

570 ʿAbdallāh, however, also figures in the pedigree of the Egyptian Fāṭimids.

571 It is not clear whether "his" refers to Abū al-Qāsim Yaḥyā or ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl.

thousand followers in the Sawād and in the East and West.[572] He also asserted that the she-camel he was riding was blessed[573] and that if they followed her wherever she went, they would be victorious. He acted as a soothsayer among them. He also exhibited // a shortened arm he had and mentioned that this [2219] was his sign. A number of the Banū al-Aṣbagh[574] flocked to him. They showed sincere devotion to him, called themselves Fāṭimids, and adopted his religion.

Subuk al-Daylamī,[575] the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid bi-llāh, pursued them in the region of al-Ruṣāfah[576] in Diyār Muḍar west of the Euphrates, but they launched a surprise attack, killing him and burning down the mosque of al-Ruṣāfah. Attacking every village they passed, they eventually reached the administrative territory of Syria which had been ceded peacefully to Hārūn b. Khumārawayh[577] and which Hārūn had entrusted to Ṭughj b. Juff. Yaḥyā b. Zikrawayh now laid siege to Syria. He routed every army of Ṭughj he encountered and eventually pinned him down in the city of Damascus. The Egyptians then dispatched Badr the Elder,[578] the page of Ibn Ṭūlūn, against Yaḥyā b. Zikrawayh. Badr joined forces with Ṭughj against Yaḥyā, and he attacked them[579] near Damascus. God killed the enemy of God, Yaḥyā b. Zikrawayh. He was reportedly killed, because a Berber struck him with a short spear and then a flame thrower sprayed him with fire, burning him. This was in the midst of the battle at its fiercest point. Then, however, the tide turned against the Egyptians, and they fled.

---

572 That is, the provinces east and west of the Iraq.

573 "Blessed (maʿmūrah)" refers to the ḥadīth of the "prolific filly (muhrah maʿmūrah)," see Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CXIX; Concordance, I, 100a25; and the dictionaries.

574 See Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, table 282; II, 202a, with the genealogy al-Aṣbagh—ʿAmr—Thaʿlabah—al-Ḥārith—Ḥiṣn—Ḍamḍam.

575 Nothing further seems to be known about him. See below, nn. 590 and 644. The vocalization of the name adopted here follows that in the well-known name Sebuktegin. See A. S. Halkin's translation of Baghdādī, Farq, 125, n. 5.

576 That is, the Ruṣāfah of Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik.

577 See text above, III, 2185f.

578 That is, Badr al-Ḥammāmī.

579 Or, "they attacked him."

The mawlās of the Banū al-ʿUllayṣ ⌜joined the Banū al-ʿUllayṣ⌝[580] and the Aṣbaghites and others who were with them ⌜and⌝ agreed to install al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh,[581] the brother of the one nicknamed al-Shaykh, as their leader, which they did. Al-Ḥusayn asserted to them that he was Aḥmad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad and that he was some twenty years old. The one nicknamed al-Shaykh had abetted the mawlās [2220] of the Banū // al-ʿUllayṣ against them, and they had killed a number of them and humiliated them. They now declared allegiance to al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh, who was named Aḥmad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar, after the death of his brother. He exhibited a mole on his face and mentioned that it was his sign. He had been joined recently by the son of his paternal uncle ʿĪsā b. Mihrawayh, who was named ʿAbdallāh.[582] He asserted that he was ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Ismāʿīl b. Jaʿfar b. Muḥammad. Al-Ḥusayn gave ʿAbdallāh the nickname of al-Muddaththir and made a covenant with him. He mentioned that he was the one meant in the sūrah in which al-muddaththir is mentioned.[583] He nicknamed a servant of his family al-Muṭawwaq[584] and put him in charge of killing captured Muslims. He defeated the Egyptians and the troops of Ḥimṣ and other Syrian cities, and had himself designated from the pulpits as the commander of the faithful. All this took place during the rest of[585] 289 and in 290 (902-3).

---

[580] The bracketed passage is not found in RB and Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 32, and should probably be omitted.

[581] His history to his death in 291 is known from the following pages. He was nicknamed "Man of the Mole" after the mole on his face, and is commonly referred to by this designation,.

[582] ʿAbdallāh died together with his cousin al-Ḥusayn. See text below, 2245f. There seems to be no additional information about ʿĪsā. Maqrīzī, Ittiʿāẓ, 118f., speaks of al-Muddaththir as "ʿĪsā, the son of Mihrawayh's sister." See also Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs," 33.

[583] Qur. 74:1.

[584] A number of vocalizations and explanations of the nickname are possible, but al-Muṭawwaq may be intended to mean "charged with an onerous and difficult duty." Considering his alleged assignment, this seems quite appropriate. Note, however, that the verb as it appears in the Qur'ān and the ḥadīth always appears in a negative context and that he is described as a young boy in the text below, 2343. It is not certain whether ghulām is, in fact, meant here to be a servant.

[585] The addition is from RC.

On Dhū al-Ḥijjah 9, 280 (December 14, 902), when people were praying in summer clothing in Baghdad, the northwind started to blow at the time of the afternoon prayer. It turned so cold that people had to kindle fires to warm themselves and put on padded clothes and overcoats. It became colder and colder until the water froze.

In this year, a battle took place between Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad in al-Rayy and Muḥammad b. Hārūn who at the time reportedly had about eight thousand men under his command. Muḥammad b. Hārūn was routed, and his men separated from him[586] He was followed // by about a thousand of his men to the Daylam [2221] country, and when he arrived there, he asked the Daylam for protection. Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad entered al-Rayy. After the rout about a thousand of Muḥammad b. Hārūn's men reportedly went to the Caliph's court in Baghdad.

⌜On Jumādā II 4, 289 (May 16, 902), al-Qāsim b. Sīmā[587] was put in charge of the summer campaign in the border towns of al-Jazīrah. Thirty-two thousand dīnārs were allocated to him.⌝[588]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik al-Hāshimī.[589]

---

586 R completes the lacuna in the text: wa-tafarraqa ʿanhu.

587 Al-Qāsim b. Sīmā al-Farghānī died Friday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 22, 305 (Friday, June 5, 918). See ʿArīb, 68. See also Eclipse, I, 15; Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 6.

588 For this entry, see Canard, Sources arabes, 17. It is not found in either R or C, a somewhat unusual agreement between these two manuscripts.

589 Al-Faḍl was the leader of the pilgrimage from 289 through 304. See also Masʿūdī, Murūj, IX, 75, ed. Pellat, V, 299f. His son led the pilgrimage in 305, but he participated in it. He died in Ṣafar, 307 (July, 919). See Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 197. ʿArīb, 118, 124, erred when he said that he led the pilgrimage in 311 and 312; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, 211, l. 12, names al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Hāshimī for the year 312.

Al-Faḍl's full pedigree was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad. ʿUbaydallāh is usually not included but is likely to be correct; he led the pilgrimage in 187 (803) (see text above, III, 701). Al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, a much younger brother of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, was born about four years before the death of his father. He was an important figure during the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd. He died, at the age of sixty-five, in Rajab, 186 (July-August, 802) (Ibn al-Athīr mentions the death of ʿAlī b. al-ʿAbbās, a nephew of al-Saffāḥ and al-Manṣūr, sub anno 186, but this may be an error). Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XI, 124f., tells us that descendants of al-Faḍl were still living in Baghdad in his time, around the middle of the eleventh century.

The Events of the Year 290

(DECEMBER 5, 902 - NOVEMBER 23, 903)

One of the events that took place this year was that al-Muktafī dispatched an emissary to Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad on al-Muḥarram 2, 290 (December 6, 902). He was accompanied by ʿAbdallāh b. al-Fatḥ, and he carried robes of honor and Ismāʿīl's letter of appointment as governor of al-Rayy as well as gifts.

On al-Muḥarram 25, 290 (December 29, 902), a dispatch from ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. al-Jarrāh reportedly arrived at Baghdad from al-Raqqah. In it ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā mentioned that the Qarmaṭian Ibn Zikrawayh, known as al-Shaykh, had reached al-Raqqah with many troops. A number of the Caliph's men headed by Subuk,[590] the page of al-Muktafī, went out and attacked him. Subuk was killed, and the Caliph's men were routed.

On Rabīʿ II 6, 290 (March 9, 903), word reached Baghdad that [2222] Ṭughj b. Juff / / had led an army out of Damascus against the Qarmaṭian. It was commanded by a page of his named Bashīr.[591] The Qarmaṭian attacked them, routed the army, and killed Bashīr.

On Rabīʿ II 16, 280 (March 19, 903), a robe of honor was bestowed upon Abū al-Agharr, and he was sent to fight the Qarmaṭian in the Syrian region. He went to Aleppo with ten thousand men.

---

[590] It would seem that he is identical with Subuk al-Daylamī, the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, mentioned in the preceding year (see above, n. 575). Note that the previous report came from west of the desert, and the one here from east of it.

[591] There is no further information about him.

On Rabīʿ II 18, 290 (March 21, 903), a robe of honor was bestowed upon Abū al-ʿAshā'ir Aḥmad b. Naṣr,[592] and he was appointed governor of Ṭarsūs. Muẓaffar b. Ḥājj[593] had been removed from the governorship because of complaints from the inhabitants of the border region against him.

On Jumādā I[594] 15, 290 (April 16, 903), letters from merchants, dated Rabīʿ II 22 (March 25), arrived at Baghdad from Damascus with the information that the Qarmaṭian nicknamed al-Shaykh had routed Ṭughj more than once and killed all but a few of his men. Ṭughj had remained in Damascus with a small group and refused to go out. The populace would gather and go out to fight. They[595] were close to ruin. A number of them and of the Baghdādī merchants gathered the very same day to go to the qāḍī Yūsuf b. Yaʿqūb. They had him read their letters and asked him to go to the wazīr and inform him about the inhabitants of Damascus. He promised them that he would do that.

On Jumādā I 23, 290 (April 24, 903), Abū Khāzim, Yūsuf, and Yūsuf's son Muḥammad were brought to the Caliph's palace simultaneously with the close associate[596] of Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. al-Layth. Peace was made with (Ṭāhir) on condition that he remit the (tax) revenues of Fārs (to the central authorities). Al-Muktafī then appointed Ṭāhir to administrate / / Fārs and [2223] bestowed a robe of honor upon his close associate. Robes of honor were taken to Ṭāhir together with the letter of appointment.

In Jumādā I, 290 (April 2-May 1, 903), an officer who had sought and obtained a guarantee of safe-conduct, Abū Saʿīd al-Khuwārizmī,[597] fled from Madīnat al-Salām and took the Mosul

---

[592] Abū al-ʿAshā'ir al-ʿUqaylī was killed in 294 (906). See text below, 2271f. For this and the following item on him, see Canard, Sources arabes, 18.

[593] See above, n. 401.

[594] R: "Jumādā II."

[595] The merchants may be meant rather than the Damascenes in general. The addition in R in the following sentence referring to "them" probably indicates that some of the Damascene merchants had come to Baghdad.

[596] The identity of this ṣāḥib (approximately translated "close associate") remains to be established.

[597] I have no further information about him.

Road. Orders that he be confronted and seized were sent to ʿAbdallāh who was known as Ghulām Nūn,[598] who was in charge of security in Takrīt and adjoining administrative districts to the borders of Sāmarrā; (similar orders were also sent) to Mosul. ʿAbdallāh supposedly confronted Abū Saʿīd, but Abū Saʿīd deceived him, so that the two came together peacefully. Abū Saʿīd then assaulted ʿAbdallāh, killing him. He then went on to Shahrazūr. He joined up with Ibn Abī al-Rabīʿ al-Kurdī and married into his family.[599] The two agreed to rebel against the central authorities. Abū Saʿīd was killed afterwards, and those who had gathered around him dispersed.

On Jumādā II 10, 290 (May 11 903), Abū al-ʿAshā'ir left for his administrative post in Ṭarsūs, and a number of volunteers left with him to undertake raids. He carried with him gifts for the Byzantine ruler from al-Muktafī.

After the afternoon prayer on Jumādā II, 19, 290 (May 20, 903), al-Muktafī left Baghdad for Sāmarrā with the intention of undertaking construction and moving there. He entered Sāmarrā on Thursday, Jumādā II 24, 290 (Wednesday, May 25, 903), and then departed for tents which had been set up for him in al-Jawsaq.[600] He summoned al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh and the men in charge of construction, and they gave him an estimate of its cost. They made it a high estimate and said that it would take a long time to finish construction of what he wanted to build. Al-Qāsim undertook to change al-Muktafī's mind by describing the expenditures [2224] as too great. The estimated amount of money // deterred al-Muktafī,[601] and he gave up his plan. He called for lunch and after eating went to sleep. When he woke up, he rode to the bank of the river and took a seat in a flyer. Al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh ordered the people to go back down to Baghdad. Most people turned 598 The final letter is r or d in CR, instead of n. Further information would be needed to establish the correct form of the name and the identity of the individual.

599 Ibn Abī al-Rabīʿ al-Kurdī, about whom I have no further information, probably made Abū Saʿīd his son-in-law, but other relationships are possible.

600 That is, the famous palace in Sāmarrā.

601 R: fa-naqalahū, instead of fa-thanāhu in the edition.

back before reaching Sāmarrā when they were met by those who were on their way back down.

On Rajab[602] 9, 290 (June 8, 903), robes of honor were bestowed upon the two sons of al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh.[603] The older son was put in charge of the estates of the (Caliph's) offspring and wives as well as expenditures, while the younger son was appointed secretary to Abū Aḥmad,[604] the son of al-Muktafī. These offices had belonged to al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr al-Naṣrānī, who was removed from them. Al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh had suspected that al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr al-Naṣrānī had been approaching al-Muktafī to intrigue against him, and he was showing open hostility to him in the presence of the Caliph. As a result, al-Qāsim continuously intrigued against al-Ḥusayn and hardened al-Muktafī's heart against him, until he accomplished what he wished would happen to al-Ḥusayn.[605]

On Friday, Shaʿbān 16, 290 (Friday, July 15, 903), two dispatches were read in the two Friday Mosques of Madīnat al-Salām. They announced that Yaḥyā b. Zikrawayh, nicknamed al-Shaykh, had been killed by the Egyptians at the gate of Damascus. There had been continuous battles between him and the inhabitants of Damascus, their soldiers, and the Egyptian reinforcements. He had broken their forces, killing many of them in the process

That Yaḥyā b. Zikrawayh used to ride a camel saddled for him[606] and wear wide garments, an Arab tribal / / head covering, [2225] and a veil. From the time he first appeared he never rode on horseback until the day he was killed. He had given orders to his men not to engage anyone in combat, even of they were attacked, until the camel would move by itself. He told them that if they did that, they would never be defeated. He mentioned[607] that if he 602 Text: "seven"; read "nine" as in RC.

---

603 The two sons were al-Ḥusayn and Muḥammad. The date of al-Ḥusayn's death is not securely attested; it probably was 322 (934). See Sourdel, Vizirat, II, 745, 463ff. Muḥammad died in 321 (933). See Sourdel, II, 476-78.

604 Abū Aḥmad Muḥammad b. al-Muktafī was involved in conspiracies in 318 (930) (ʿArīb, 152) and 320-1 (932-3) (ʿArīb, 185; Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 77; Ibn Kathir, Bidāyah, XI, 172f.). He died in 321 (933). See also below, n. 707.

605 As described in the text below, 2230.

606 R: yurḥalu lahū.

607 The active here seems preferable to the passive.

should point his hand in the direction of those fighting him, the people there would be routed. In this way, he deceived the Arab tribesmen.[608]

On the day Yaḥyā b. Zikrawayh, nicknamed al-Shaykh, was killed, his men rallied around his brother al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh; al-Ḥusayn searched for his brother among those killed, and having found his corpse, he concealed it. He had himself acknowledged as leader and called himself Abū al-ʿAbbās Aḥmad b. ʿAbdallāh. Badr's[609] men later realized that al-Shaykh had been killed, and searched for his corpse among those killed but could not find it.

Al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh propagandized as his brother had done. Most of the tribesmen and others from among all the people (in the region) responded to his call. He gained great strength, came out in the open, and marched on Damascus. The inhabitants of Damascus reportedly concluded a truce with him in return for the payment of tax money. Following this he left them. He then moved on the environs of Ḥimṣ and seized control of the city. His name was mentioned from the pulpits during the Friday service. He called himself al-Mahdī.[610] He then moved on the city of Ḥimṣ. Fearing for their lives, its inhabitants declared their loyalty and opened the city gate to him. He entered Ḥimṣ, and then moved from there on Ḥamāh, Maʿarrat al-Nuʿmān, and other cities, killing their inhabitants, including women, children, and infants. Then he moved on Baʿlabakk and killed most of its inhabitants, until only a few ⌜reportedly⌝ [2226] were left. From there he moved on // Salamyah,[611] but its inhabitants fought and prevented him from entering. He thereupon made promises to them, granting them a guarantee of safe-conduct. As a result, they opened the city gate to him, and he entered Salamyah. First he began killing the Hāshimites, a number of whom lived there. Then, he killed all the inhabitants.

---

608 Miskawayh, in his quotation (Tajārib, V, 33), summarized this paragraph in the words: "He used to claim to be a prophet and soothsayer."

609 That is, Badr al-Ḥammāmī.

610 That is, he claimed to be the expected redeemer (mahdī). See also the prominent position accorded to this claim in the protocol of the Qarmaṭian leader (see below, 2232).

611 The reputed home of the Egyptian Fāṭimids and, as we see here, a preferred place of residence for the ʿAbbāsid/Hāshimite aristocracy in Syria.

He slaughtered the animals and afterwards the school children. Following this he departed, reportedly leaving not a living soul there. He then moved on the surrounding villages, killing, taking captives, burning, and making the roads unsafe.

The following story is told on the authority of a physician from Bāb al-Muḥawwal,[612] called Abū al-Ḥasan:

After the Qarmaṭian Man of the Mole and his men had been brought to Baghdad,[613] a woman came to me and said that she had a problem with her shoulder which she wanted me to treat. When I asked her what it was, she replied that it was a wound. I said that I was an eye doctor, but that there was a woman here who treated women and also wounds; she should wait for her to come. She sat down, and I saw that she was sad and crying. I asked her what was the matter with her and what had caused her wound? She replied that hers was a long story. I told her to tell me as she would a friend, now that the people who were in my home[614] had gone.

She said: I had a son who had been away for a long time. He had left sisters of his for me to take care of. I was in tight circumstances and in need, and I longed for him. He had gone to the region of al-Raqqah. I therefore left for Mosul, Balad, and al-Raqqah, all the while searching for him and asking about him, but I was unable to find him.

Having left al-Raqqah in search of him, I came upon the Qarmaṭian camp. I began to walk around, looking for him. While doing that, I saw him. I clung to him and said, "Son!," and he said, "(You are) my mother?" I answered, "Yes," and he said, "How are my sisters doing?" I replied, "They are well!" I complained to him / / about the tight circumstances we had gotten [2227] into after he had left. He took me to his residence and sat in front [612] For Bāb al-Muḥawwal, see Lassner, Topography, 247. I have not succeeded in identifying Abū al-Ḥasan.

---

The following story, which in contrast to the frequent documents is pure fiction, is nevertheless most illuminating with respect to the Qarmaṭian phenomenon. It is also an extraordinary specimen of the art of storytelling hardly matched elsewhere in Arabic literature with its genius for the genre. Carefully constructed for maximum suspense and effect, it contains subtle descriptions of human character and skillfully intermingles personal experiences with highly tendentious and inflammable political propaganda.

[613] For al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh's humiliating end in Baghdad, see text below, 2245.

[614] That is, the patients in his waiting room.

of me. He started talking to me, asking for news about us, and I told him. Then he said, "Don't tell me anymore about that! Tell me what is your religion?" I replied, "Why are you asking me about my religion when you know me and you know what my religion is?" He replied, "All the beliefs we once held are wrong. The (true) religion is the beliefs we are holding now." I thought this exceedingly strange. When he noticed my reaction, he went out and left me. Then he sent me bread and meat and things good for him[615] and told me to cook, but I left it all untouched. He came back later, cooked the food, and cleansed his place.

Someone knocked at the door. He went out, and there was a man there who asked him whether that woman who had come to him knew how to take care of certain matters pertaining to women. My son asked me, and I said that I did. The man then told me to come with him. I went with him, and he brought me into a house where there was a woman about to give birth. I seated myself in front of her and started to talk to her, but she did not respond. The man who brought me to her then said to me, "You don't have to talk to her. Take good care of her business and don't talk to her!" I stayed until she gave birth to a boy, and I took care of him. I started to talk to her kindly and said, "Woman! Don't be bashful with me! You are obligated to me. Let me hear your story and tell me who is the father of this child!" She said, "Are you asking me about his father, so that you can go to him and ask him for a gift?" I replied, "No! I just want to know your story."

She told me, "I am a Hāshimite women." She raised her head, [2228] and I saw the most beautiful / / face. "Those people came to us and slaughtered my father, my mother, my brothers, and my entire family. Their leader then seized me, and I stayed with him five days. He then took me out and handed me over to his men, saying to them, 'Cleanse her!'[616] They meant to kill me, and I cried. One of his officers present said, 'Give her to me!', to which he responded, 'Take her!' So he took me. But three of his men were standing in his presence. They drew their swords and said, 'We shall not hand her over to you. Hand her over to us, or [615] Text: "good for me"; read as in RC.

[616] That is, "kill her." See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCCXLIII.

we shall kill you.' They meant to kill me and caused a stir. Their Qarmaṭian leader called and asked them what was the matter, and they told him. He said, 'She shall belong to all four of you.' They took me, and I stayed with the four of them. By God, I do not know which of them is the father of this boy."

(The woman in Baghdad) continued: After the evening prayer, a man came, and she told me to congratulate him. I congratulated him on the newborn child, and he gave me a silver ingot. Another man, and still another came. I congratulated each one, and each gave me a silver ingot. At dawn, a group of people came with a man. A torch was carried before him. He wore silk clothes, and the smell of musk emanated from him. She told me to congratulate him. I rose and went to him and said, "May God gladden your face! Praised be God who has given you this son!" I blessed him, and he gave me an ingot weighing a thousand dirhams.[617] The man spent the night in one room, and I spent the night with the woman in another.

In the morning, I said to her , "Woman! You are obligated to me. For God's sake, set me free!" When she asked me from what she should set me free, I told her about my son, saying, "I came because I wanted him. He told me such // and such things. I [2229] cannot do anything with him.[618] I have little daughters, unable to take care of themselves, whom I left behind in the worst possible condition. Therefore set me free, so that I can leave here and rejoin my daughters!" She said to me, "You have to ask the man who was the last to come. Ask him for it, and he will set you free." I stayed all day until evening. When he came back, I approached him, kissed his hand and foot, and said, "My lord, you are obligated to me. God has enriched me through you and your gift. I have poor daughters unable to take care of themselves. If you allow me to go, I shall bring my daughters, and they shall be before you and serve you." He said, "Will you do that?" When I said I would, he called some of his pages and told them to escort me to such and such a place and then leave me and come back. They had me mount a horse and escorted me to the place.

[617] Roughly three thousand grams.
[618] That is, probably, I cannot get any help from him.

She continued: While we were traveling, suddenly here was my son galloping along. We had already traveled ten *farsakh*s (sixty km), or so the people who were with me told me. He came up to me where we were and said, "You whore! You plan to go and bring your daughters?" He drew his sword to strike me. The people who were with me restrained him, but the edge of his sword touched me and entered my shoulder. The people drew their swords, intending to get at him. He therefore drew away from me.[619] They took me to the place which their master had designated, and then left me and went away. When I arrived here, I made the rounds of the physicians in Baghdad in order to find someone to treat my wound. This place was described to me, and so I have come here.

⌜She continued:⌝ When the Commander of the Faithful arrived with the captured Qarmaṭian and his men, I went out to look at [2230] them. Among them I saw / / my son upon a camel wearing a hood and crying; he was a young man. I said to him, "May God not grant you relief and escape!"

The physician said: When the woman doctor came, I took her to her and commended her to her care. She treated her wound and gave her a salve. After she had left, I asked the woman doctor about her. She said, "I had my hand placed upon the wound and told her to exhale. She did, and the breath came out through the wound underneath my hand. I do not think she will recover." She went off and did not return to us.

On Shawwāl 18, 290 (September 14, 903), al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh had al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr al-Naṣrānī arrested and incarcerated. That was because al-Ḥusayn had constantly intrigued against him and slandered him in the presence of al-Muktafī. Eventually (the Caliph) ordered (al-Qāsim) to arrest him. When al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr was arrested, his secretary who was known as al-Shīrāzī[620] fled. He was sought, the residences of his neighbors were raided, and a certain sum was announced as a reward for finding him, but he was not found. On Shawwāl 22, 290 (September 18, 903), al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAmr was returned to his residence on condition that he leave Baghdad. On the following Friday (September 23, 903), he left, going toward Wāsiṭ into exile. His secretary al-Shīrāzī was found on Dhū al-Qaʿdah[621] 3, 290 (September 28, 903).

619 R: "them."
620 I have no further information about him.

On Ramaḍān 2, 290 (July 30, 903), al-Muktafī gave orders that the army be given its allotments and made ready to go to war with the Qarmaṭian in Syria. One hundred thousand dīnārs were allocated to the army all at once. This was because // the [2231]
Egyptians[622] had written to al-Muktafī and complained about their suffering at the hands of Zikrawayh's son known as the Man of the Mole. He was devastating the country and killing the people. They had also suffered earlier at the hands of his brother; the two had killed their men, and only a few were now left.

⌜On Ramaḍān 5, 290 (August 2, 903), al-Muktafī's tents were taken out and set up at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah.⌝ At dawn on Ramaḍān 7,[623] (August 4, 903), al-Muktafī went to his tent at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah accompanied by his officers, pages, and troops. On Ramaḍān 12 (August 9), he left his tent at dawn and took to the Mosul Road. On Ramaḍān 15 (August 12), Abū al-Agharr went to Aleppo. He encamped at Wādī Buṭnān near Aleppo together with all his men. ⌜A number of his men took off⌝. their clothes and went into the river[624] to cool off in the water, because it was a very hot day. While they were thus engaged, the army of the Qarmaṭian known as the Man of the Mole came upon them, preceded by[625] the man known as al-Muṭawwaq. He surprised them in this condition and killed a large number of them and looted their camp. Abū al-Agharr fled with a number of his men and entered Aleppo; about a thousand men escaped with him. He had had about ten thousand horsemen and foot soldiers, since a number of officers and men of the Farghānah contingent from the Caliph's court had been attached to him. Only a few of them escaped. The Qarmaṭian's men arrived at

---

621 R: "Ramaḍān."

622 "Egyptians" refers to the armed forces in Syria under Egyptian control. Understandably, R reads "Syrians," and Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 35, has "Egyptians and Syrians."

623 C: "six"; R: "nine."

624 Wādī Buṭnān was located east of Aleppo. The river (wādī) meant here is the Nahr al-Dhahab. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 389.

625 R: "with their leader," for "preceded by."

the gate of Aleppo where Abū al-Agharr and his remaining men fought him along with local people. After a battle between them, the Qarmaṭians left (Abū al-Agharr), taking with them the horses, weapons, money ⌜and goods⌝ that they had taken from the camp. Al-Muktafī moved on with the troops who were with him [2232] // and eventually reached al-Raqqah. He encamped there and sent one army after the other against the Qarmaṭian.

On Shawwāl ⌜2, 290 (August 29, 903)⌝, a dispatch from al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh arrived at Madīnat al-Salām. In it, al-Qāsim reported that a dispatch had reached him from Damascus from Badr al-Ḥammāmī, the close associate of Ibn Ṭūlūn, with the information that he had attacked the Qarmaṭian Man of the Mole; he had routed him and put his men to the sword. Those who escaped had fled toward the desert. The dispatch went on to indicate that the Commander of the Faithful had sent al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān ⌜b. Ḥamdūn⌝ and other officers in pursuit of him.

In these days, ⌜another⌝ dispatch reportedly arrived at Baghdad from the amīr of al-Baḥrayn, Ibn Bānū.[626] In it, he mentioned that he had made a surprise attack upon a stronghold of the Qarmaṭians and overcome its occupants.

On Dhū al-Qaʿdah ⌜13, 290 (October 8, 903)⌝, another dispatch reportedly arrived at Baghdad from ⌜Ibn Bānū in⌝ al-Baḥrayn. In it, he mentioned that he had attacked relatives of Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī as well as the person al-Jannābī had appointed to lead his loyal followers after his death,[627] and he had routed him. That person was installed in al-Qaṭīf. After his men were routed, he was found dead among those killed. Ibn Bānū then had his head cut off. The dispatch went on to indicate that he then conquered and entered al-Qaṭīf.

---

[626] Ibn Bānū's position appears to have been that of the government's military representative in a very troubled region. It is possible that Khalaf b. Aḥmad b. Bānū, who is mentioned in 354 (965) (Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 190; Eclipse, Index), was related to him, perhaps his son. However, there is no supporting evidence for this assumption.

[627] I have not succeeded in determining the identity of this "crown prince (walī al-ʿahd)." The title may, or may not, be germane to the Qarmaṭians.

A letter of the Man of the Mole to one of his officials:[628]

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate

From the servant of God Aḥmad b. ʿAbdallāh, the Mahdī, the One Supported by God, the Supporter of the Religion of God, the Executor of the Command of God, the Administrator according to the Judgment of God,[629] the Missionary for the Book of God, the Defender of the Sacred Territory[630] of God, the Chosen One of the Children of the Messenger of God, the Commander // of the Faithful and the Imām of the [2233] Muslims, the Humbler of the Hypocrites, the Lieutenant of God in charge of the Worlds, the Reaper of the Wrongdoers, the Breaker of the Transgressors, the Vanquisher of the Heretics, the Slayer of the Evildoers, the Destroyer of the Wicked, the Lamp of those who can see and the Light of those who wish to see light, the Scatterer of the Opponents, the Administrator of the Tradition (sunnah) of Those Sent as Messengers,[631] the Descendant of the Best of Legatees,[632] God bless him and the goodly people of his house and make them prosper mightily!

To Jaʿfar b. Ḥumayd al-Kurdī:[633] Greetings to you! I praise in your behalf God, but Whom there is no other God, and I ask Him to pray for my ancestor Muḥammad, the Messenger of God and his family.

Information has reached us about the events caused in your parts by the unbelieving enemies of God, the things they have done in your region, and the wrongdoing, harass-

---

628 The complete authenticity of the following two documents is virtually certain. It is confirmed by the fact that they have apparently little direct bearing upon the events of the year but are used to convey the flavor of the way in which the Qarmaṭian organization was run. Both indicate the independence of local commanders, in spite of their expressions of subservience to the leader of the sect. Cf. Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs," 42-44, for a discussion and translation of the letters.

629 It may be noted that the preceding titles reappear later among the throne names of the Egyptian Fāṭimids. See Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs," 42f.

630 This seems to be the intended meaning of ḥarīm Allāh. Ibn Taghrībirdī has, in fact, ḥaram Allāh (Nujūm, III, 206f.), but this seems to be a simplification, or rather an error.

631 The addition in the Cairo edition: "...Tradition of (the Lord of)..." appears to have no manuscript authority.

632 That is, ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

633 There is no further information about him.

ment,[634] and corruption ⌜on earth⌝ they have manifested. We have found it outrageous and consider it appropriate to dispatch our troops there. Through them, God will take revenge on His wrongdoing enemies who "eagerly cause corruption on earth."[635] We have dispatched our dāʿī ʿUṭayr[636] and a number of the Faithful to the city of Ḥimṣ and have reinforced them with troops. We are following behind them. We have suggested to them that they march toward your region and seek out the enemies of God wherever they are. We do hope that God will let us proceed with respect to them in the best fashion we are accustomed to from Him with respect to the likes of them. It is necessary for you to fortify your heart and the hearts of your associates who are with you, and to trust in God and in His support, which He has always and customarily given us with respect to everybody [2234] who has deviated from obeying Him // and has strayed from the faith.

God willing, let us quickly have reports about news in your region and do not conceal anything from us!

"Glory to you, O God! Their greeting in Paradise is 'Welcome!' and the end of their call is that 'Praise is due to God, the Lord of the Worlds.' " [637] May God bless my ancestor Muḥammad, the Messenger of God, and the people of his house and make them prosper mightily!

A copy of a letter of one of his officials to him:

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate

To the Servant of God Aḥmad, the Imām, the Mahdī, the One Supported by God—followed by all the titles as in the copy of his letter to his official just quoted by us to "Descendant of the Best Legatees, may God bless him and the goodly people of his house and make them prosper mightily," continuing:

---

[634] Text: ʿabath "nonsense"; read ʿayth, as in R and the Cairo edition.
[635] Qur. 5:33, 64.
[636] See text below, 2287 (ʿArīb, 36). For dāʿiyatanā, R clearly reads rāʿiyanā.
[637] Qur. 10:10.

From ʿĀmir b. ʿĪsā al-ʿAnqāʾī:[638] Greetings to the Commander of the Faithful ⌜and the mercy and blessings of God upon him!

May God give⌝ the Commander of the Faithful a long life, and may He make his power, aid, help, well-being, nobility, ⌜grace,⌝ and happiness last! May He pour His favors upon him and increase His kindness and generosity to him!

The letter of my lord, the Commander of the Faithful—May God give him a long life!—has arrived. In it, he informs me that some victorious troops together with one of his officers have been dispatched to our region for the holy war against the enemies of God, the Banū al-Fuṣayṣ,[639] and the traitor Ibn Duḥaym, and that they are to seek them out wherever they are and attack them and their associates and their estates. He—May God make his power last!—is ordering me, upon seeing / / this letter, to set out to meet them[640] with [2235] all the men and tribesmen of mine that I can muster, to aid and support the army, to march with them, and to do all they indicate[641] and command. I have understood his letter.

No sooner had this letter reached me—may God give power to the Commander of the Faithful—than the ⌜victorious⌝ troops arrived. They reached an area within the region controlled by Ibn Duḥaym and turned back with the letter that had reached them from the dāʿī Masrūr b. Aḥmad[642] (asking them) to meet him in the city of Afāmiyah.

Then, about the same time as the letter whose contents I have reported in the beginning of the letter reached me, a letter ⌜from Masrūr b. Aḥmad⌝[643] reached me. In it, Masrūr ordered me to gather my available men and tribesmen and set out and come to him. He warned me not to stay away. His letter reached me when it had become clear to us that the 638 There is no further information on him, and the reading ʿAnqāʾī is conjectural. A locality ʿAnqāʾ existed in Arabia, see Bakrī, Muʿjam, 881.

---

639 See text below, 2239. For their presence in Lādhiqiyyah in 319 (931), see Ibn al-ʿAdīm, Zubdat al-ḥalab, I, 97. I have not succeeded in identifying Ibn Duḥaym.

640 Probably, the support troops. The pronoun might, however, refer to the enemy.

641 R: wa-al-ʿamal (?) bi-kull mā yakūn mim-mā yūm(i')ūna bihī. See C.

642 There seems to be no further information on him.

643 This is another letter from Masrūr different from the one mentioned in the preceding paragraph.

deviator Subuk,[644] the slave of Mufliḥ, had come to the city of ʿIrqah[645] with about a thousand men, horsemen and foot soldiers, and was within sight of our region and location. Now, Aḥmad b. al-Walīd,[646] the slave of the Commander of the Faithful—May God give him a long life!—has sent messengers to all his men, and I have sent messengers to all my men. We have gathered them around us and have sent spies to the region of ʿIrqah, in order to obtain reports about that traitor and where he wants to go, so that we can proceed accordingly. ⌜We hope that God in His kindness and might will overpower and subdue him. Had that deviator not come to this region⌝ and were he not close to our location, I would not have postponed setting out with all my men for the city
[2236] of Afāmiyah to join forces with the people[647] // who are staying there, in order to fight the holy war against ⌜those who are in⌝ that region, until God, the Best of Judges, passes judgment between us.[648]

This is to inform my lord, the Commander of the Faithful—May God give him a long life!—why I have stayed away from Masrūr b. Aḥmad, so that he will know my reason. If he—May God make his power last!—later orders me to proceed to Afāmiyah, I shall proceed, God willing, in accordance with his view and obey his command.

⌜May God's favors materialize for the Commander of the Faithful! May He make his power and well-being last! May He let him enjoy His generosity, and may He clothe him in His beneficent care!⌝ Peace be upon the Commander of the Faithful and the mercy and blessings of God! Praise be to God, the Lord of the Worlds! May God bless ⌜the Prophet⌝ Muḥammad and the pure[649] and chosen people of his house!

---

[644] Apparently, Subuk al-Mufliḥī who was governor of al-Baṣrah when he was killed in 311 (923). See ʿArīb, 111; Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 40; see also Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 300. The Mufliḥ in question was killed in 258 (872). See text above, III, 1862. Although the time frame of the letters is uncertain, an identification with the aforementioned Subuk al-Daylamī (see above nn. 575 and 590) may be ruled out.

[645] About twenty-four km east of Ṭarābulus, according to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 653. See also Dussaud, Topographie historique, 80ff. (ʿArqa).

[646] There is no further information about him.

[647] Text: al-quwwād "the officers"; read al-qawm "(army) people" as in RC.

[648] See Qur. 10:109, 12:80.

[649] R: "good."

In this year, al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh sent troops against the Man of the Mole, putting Muḥammad b. Sulaymān al-Kātib, who headed the Dīwān of the Army, in charge of the campaign. Al-Qāsim attached all the officers to him and commanded them to obey him loyally. Muḥammad proceeded from al-Raqqah with a substantial army and wrote the officers in advance of him that they were to obey him loyally.

In this year, two emissaries of the Byzantine ruler, one of them a eunuch and the other not, arrived in Baghdad. They came to ask (al-Muktafī) to enter into ransom negotiations for the Muslims whom the Byzantine ruler was holding captive. They brought presents from the Byzantine ruler as well as several Muslim captives he was sending to the Caliph. Their request was granted, and robes of honor were bestowed upon them.[650]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik ⌜b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad.⌝ // [2237]

[650] See Canard, Sources arabes, 18. It may be noted that this passage does not occur in either R or C. Although it is found only in B, there is no reason to doubt that it belonged to some recension of the History.

The ⌜Important⌝ Events of the Year 291

(NOVEMBER 24, 903 - NOVEMBER 12, 904)

One of the events was the battle between the government forces and the Man of the Mole and his men.

The Report on this Battle

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: As has already been mentioned, al-Muktafī had marched from Madīnat al-Salām to war against the Man of the Mole. He had reached al-Raqqah and deployed his troops between Aleppo and Ḥimṣ. He had put Muḥammad b. Sulaymān ⌜al-Kātib⌝ in charge of the campaign against the Man of the Mole and given him command of his troops and officers. Now, at the beginning of this year, al-Muktafī's wazīr al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh wrote to Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and the government officers ordering them to take a stand against the Man of the Mole and his men. They marched ⌜against him⌝ and eventually reached a location that was reportedly twelve mīl (twenty-four km) from Ḥamāh.[651] There, ⌜on Tuesday,⌝ al-Muḥarram 6, 291 (Tuesday, November 29, 903), they encountered the Qarmaṭian's men. He had sent them in advance, while he himself remained behind with a number of others; he had with him money that he had accumulated. His train was placed by him in the rear. A battle broke out between the government forces and those of the Qarmaṭian, and the fighting became fierce. The Qarmaṭian's men were routed, and many of them were killed or captured. The rest dispersed in the desert. They were pursued by the government forces during Wednesday night,[652] al-Muḥarram 7, 291 (Wednesday, November 30, 903). When the Qarmaṭian saw how his men had been defeated and routed, he reportedly had / / Abū [2238] al-Faḍl,[653] a brother of his, transport money, ordering him to stay in the desert until he himself would appear at a certain location, and then he should come to him. The Qarmaṭian himself, his cousin al-Muddaththir, his close associate al-Muṭawwaq, and a Byzantine page of his mounted, and, taking a guide, they rode off straight across the desert in the direction of al-Kūfah. When he eventually reached a place known as al-Dāliyah[654] in the administrative district of the Euphrates Road, their provisions and fodder had run out. He sent one of the men who were with him to obtain for him[655] whatever was needed. The man entered al-Dāliyah, which was known as Dāliyat Ibn Ṭawq, to buy what he needed. People did not recognize the dress he was wearing, and, when asked about his business, he fumbled. A report was then made to the man in charge of the regional armory, a man known as Abū Khubzah,[656] the lieutenant of Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Kushmard,[657] the official of the Commander of the Faithful al-Muktafī in charge of the security of al-Raḥbah and the Euphrates Road. Abū Khubzah rode out with a number of people and asked the man about his story. He informed him that the Man of the Mole was behind a hill there with three persons. Abū Khubzah went and seized them and brought them to his master, Ibn Kushmard, who, with Abū Khubzah, took them to al-Muktafī in al-Raqqah. The troops returned from pursuing the enemy after killing or capturing all the allies and partisans of the Qarmaṭian that they could.

[651] This place is apparently the same as the one later described as the camp of the Qarmaṭians, see below, n. 661.

---

652 That is, immediately after the Tuesday battle on the night from Tuesday to Wednesday.

653 For Abū al-Faḍl's activities two years later, see text below, 2255f. (ʿArīb, 9). Although no name is mentioned there, the same individual is likely to be meant. R: "Abū al-ʿAbbās."

654 The waterwheel (dāliyah) of Mālik b. Ṭawq was located on the western bank of the Euphrates between ʿĀnah and al-Raḥbah (=Raḥbat Mālik b. Ṭawq). Its claim to historical fame is the event described here. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 538. On Mālik b. Ṭawq and the suspected confusion with his father Ṭawq b. Mālik, see text above, I, 117; Azdī, Taʾrīkh al-Mawṣil, 407, n. 2. For the equation of al-Dāliyah with al-Ṣāliḥiyyah/Dura-Europos, see Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs," 49, n. 96.

655 R: "for them."

656 No further information about him is available.

657 See above, n. 398.

Muḥammad b. Sulaymān sent the wazīr the following victory dispatch:[658]

In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate

I hope that God willing, the previous dispatches I have sent to the wazīr—May God give him strength!—concerning the accursed Qarmaṭian and his partisans have arrived.

[2239] On / / Tuesday, al-Muḥarram 6, 291 (Tuesday, November 29, 903), I moved from the place known as al-Qarwānah to a place known as al-ʿAlyānah[659] with the entire army of allies. We advanced in battle order, center, right wing, left wing, and so on. I had not gone far when a report reached me indicating that the Qarmaṭian unbeliever had dispatched al-Nuʿmān, the son of the brother of Ismāʿīl b. al-Nuʿmān,[660] one of his dāʿīs, with three thousand horsemen and a large number of foot soldiers. He had encamped in a place known as Tmnʿ[661] twelve mīl [twenty-four km] from Ḥamāh; all the horsemen and foot soldiers from Maʿarrat al-Nuʿmān and the region of the Fuṣayṣ and other regions had joined him. I kept this information concealed from the officers and everybody else and did not reveal it. I asked the guide who was with me about the distance between us and that place. He said that it was six mīl (twelve km).

Putting my trust in Almighty God, I ordered the guide to march against (al-Nuʿmān), ⌜and he took everybody along⌝.[662] We marched until I reached the unbelievers. I found them arrayed in battle order, and we[663] saw their vanguards. When they noticed our approach, they moved toward us, and we [658] Although Ṭabarī often refers to and also briefly quotes ʿAbbāsid victory dispatches (see, for instance, text above, III, 2141f.), this is the first long and detailed example he gives for a literary genre which gained particular importance in Ottoman times. See EI[2], s. v. fatḥnāme. See also Balawī, Sīrat Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, 265f. The long report on the suppression of internal unrest (text above, III, 1565ff.) represents a different type of dispatch.

---

[659] Both the locations and the forms of the names of these places are not known.

[660] For Abū Muḥammad Ismāʿīl b. al-Nuʿmān, see below, n. 704. I have no further information on his nephew beyond Ṭabarī's text.

[661] R: "Tamīʿ." The form of the name is uncertain. Map VIII of Dussand, Topographie historique, shows, "Temania" north of Ḥamāh at a slightly greater distance, but the two names most probably have nothing to do with each other. See also above, n. 651.

[662] The meaning is not quite certain.

[663] R: "I."

moved toward them. They were divided into ⌜six⌝ squadrons. According to information given me by one of their leaders whom I overpowered, they had put in charge of their left wing Masrūr al-ʿUlaymī,[664] Abū al-Ḥiml,[665] a page of Hārūn al-ʿUllayṣī, Abū al-ʿAdhāb, Rajā', Ṣāfī, and Abū Yaʿlā al-ʿAlawī with one thousand five hundred horsemen. Behind their left wing, and opposite our right wing, they had set up an ambush[666] with four hundred horsemen. In the center, they had placed al-Nuʿmān al-ʿUllayṣī, the one known as Abū / / al-Ḥty, and al-Ḥm'ry[667] and a number of (commanders) like them[668] with one thousand four hundred horsemen and three thousand foot soldiers. On their right wing, they had placed Kulayb al-ʿUllayṣī, a man known as al-Sadīd[669] al-ʿUllayṣī, al-Ḥusayn ⌜b.⌝ al-ʿUllayṣī, Abū al-Jarrāḥ al-ʿUllayṣī, Ḥamdūn[670] al-ʿUllayṣī, and a number of (commanders) like them. They had one thousand four hundred horsemen with them, and they had set up an ambush with two hundred horsemen. They advanced steadily toward us, while we were marching toward them in closed formation,[671] putting our trust in Almighty God. I had urged on the allies, the pages, and all the other men with promises. [2240]

When we were in sight of each other, the squadron on their left wing attacked, whipping (their horses), and moved toward al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān,[672] who was on the flank of the right wing. Al-Ḥusayn—May God bless him and give him a good reward!—personally confronted them with all 664 Text: "al-ʿUllayṣī"; read "al-ʿUlaymī," as in RC. No further information on the Qarmaṭian officers mentioned here is likely to exist.

---

665 RC: "al-Jamal."

666 "Reserve force" would be somewhat more to the point. See text below, 2263.

667 R: "al-Ḥuṭṭī" and "al-Ḥammūnī." The correct forms of the names cannot be established.

668 Text: bṭlānihim (?), apparently meant to have the same meaning as abṭāl heroes," is highly dubious. R and, if I am not mistaken, C have nuẓarā'ihim, as translated above.

669 R: "Abū al-Shadīd."

670 Text: "Ḥumayd"; read Ḥamdūn as in R.

671 Lit., "not dispersing."

672 Possibly, "al-Ḥusayn...started moving." Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 38, in summarizing the victory dispatch, states that al-Ḥusayn was the architect of the victory and that he was praised very highly for this by Muḥammad b. Sulaymān.

the men who were with him.[673] Using their lances, they broke them in the Qarmaṭians' breasts, whereupon (the Qarmaṭians) withdrew from them. When the Qarmatians resumed their attack against them, they took their swords, striking the enemy in their faces. During the first onslaught, six hundred horsemen of the wicked unbelievers fell. Al-Ḥusayn's men seized five hundred horses and four hundred silver necklaces. The Qarmaṭians turned their backs and fled, and al-Ḥusayn pursued them. They counter-attacked incessantly, making onslaught after onslaught. In the course of these engagements, one group of theirs after the other fell, until Almighty God had annihilated them. Less than two hundred of their men escaped.

The squadron on their right wing attacked al-Qāsim b. Sīmā and Yumn al-Khādim[674] and the Banū Shaybān and Banū Tamīm who were with them. They confronted them [2241] with their lances, until // they broke them in the enemy, and they grappled with each other. A large number of the wicked were killed. At the time of their onslaught, they were attacked by Khalīfah b. al-Mubārak[675] and Lu'lu' whose three hundred horsemen I had deployed flanking Khalīfah and all his men. ⌜They were fighting alongside the Banū Shaybān and the Tamīm.⌝ A great many of the unbelievers were killed, and (the government forces) pursued them. The Banū Shaybān took three hundred horses and a hundred necklaces from them, and Khalīfah's men took a like number.

Al-Nuʿmān and the men with him in the center advanced toward us. Positioned between the center and the right wing, I attacked with those who were with me. Khāqān, Naṣr al-Qushūrī, and Muḥammad b. Kumushjūr and those with him[676] on the right wing also attacked, as did Waṣīf Mūshgīr, Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundājīq, the two sons of Kay-673 Text: li-mawḍiʿihī "where he stood"; read bi-man maʿahū, as in RC.

674 He may be identical with one of the many Yumns mentioned in the sources for this time, but no certain identity can be established for him.

675 That is, Abū al-Agharr.

676 Read, as in RC, maʿahū; text: "with them."

ghalagh[677] and those with them, al-Mubārak al-Qummī,[678] Rabīʿah b. Muḥammad,[679] Muhājir b. Ṭulayq,[680] al-Muẓaffar b. Ḥājj, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥamdān,[681] Jinnī the Elder, Waṣīf al-Buktamirī,[682] Bishr al-Buktamirī,[683] and Muḥammad b. Qarāṭughān.[684] Flanking the right wing were all those who had attacked the men in the center as well as those who had disengaged themselves from the attackers of al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān. They continued killing the unbelievers, horsemen and foot soldiers alike, until they were slain, over a distance of more than five mīl (ten km).[685]

When I went a half mīl beyond the battle lines, I feared that the unbelievers might be planning a ruse against the foot soldiers and the train. Therefore I halted until they reached me. I gathered them and the men around me, while in front of me was the blessed spear, the spear of the Commander of the Faithful.[686]

I had // attacked right at the beginning, and so had the troops, while all the time ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī secured the train, stationing battle lines behind them with the horsemen and the foot soldiers according to a plan I had drawn up for him. He did not leave his position, until all the troops from every location had returned ⌜to me⌝. I set up my tents at the place [2242]

677 Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh, who was twice governor of Egypt (Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 206ff., 242ff.), was more prominent than his brother Ibrāhīm. He was accorded the honor, rare for a military leader, of a separate biographical notice in Ibn ʿAsākir, Taʾrīkh Dimashq (see the Tahdhīb, published in Damascus in 1911, I, 440f.), quoted in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, V, 63. It is stated there that Ibrāhīm died in the beginning of Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 303 (May 7, 916), but there seems to be no indication of how long Aḥmad survived the final loss of authority in Egypt in 323 (935); however, he is mentioned once more in Eclipse, I, 332, sub anno 324.

678 He was killed in 294 (906). See text below, 2271 (ʿArīb, 15).

679 He may be identical with Abū ʿAdnān Rabīʿah b. Muḥammad. See text below, 2281.

680 R rather implausibly makes him an ancestor of the preceding Rabīʿah.

681 Al-Ḥusayn's brother Abū al-Hayjāʾ ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥamdān (see above, n. 87) d. al-Muḥarram, 317 (March, 929). See Canard, Ḥamdanides, 341-78.

682 He became the successor of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAmr al-Ghanawī in Diyār Muḍar in 305 (917) but proved inadequate and was replaced by Jinnī al-Ṣafwānī. See ʿArīb, 69; Eclipse, I, 56.

683 R: "Yusr."

684 I have no further information about him.

685 See above, n. 93. As stated in the following paragraph, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān became concerned about the danger of his men dispersing over a wide area in order to kill and loot.

686 The caliphal miṭrad "spear" served here as a rallying point. Miṭrad appears in combination with ʿalam in the sense of flag.

where I had halted, until everybody had encamped, and remained there until after the evening prayer, when all the men were safely quartered. I sent out vanguards, and then I dismounted and praised God profusely for the victory He had allowed us to enjoy. Each and every one of the officers and pages of the Commander of the Faithful as well as the non-Arabs[687] and others, achieved their goal of assisting this blessed dynasty and offering it good counsel. God bless them all!

When the people had gone to rest, I and all the officers went out to stay outside the camp until morning. We did this fearing that some ruse might be used (against us). I am asking God for complete favor and a share of gratefulness.[688] I am now—May God give power to our lord the wazīr—on my way to Ḥamāh. Then, with the kind help of Almighty God, I shall march to Salamyah, since the remaining unbelievers as well as the Unbeliever[689] are in Salamyah, where he arrived three days ago.

I think it is necessary for the wazīr to proceed with writing a letter to all the officers and ⌜all⌝ the Arab subtribes of the Banū Shaybān, the Taghlib, and the Banū Tamīm, commending and rewarding them for what happened in this battle. For none of them, young or old, has left any of the goals unattained.[690]

Praised be God for favors granted! It is He whom I am asking for full grace.

---

[687] Reference to the ʿajam "non-Arabs" here, in contrast to the allied Arab tribesmen, is natural in view of the fact that the officers and pages were at best second-generation Turks, Daylam, Persians, and so were the contingents of fighting men they commanded. They were to be treated and rewarded differently from the Arab bedouins. See below, n. 690.

[688] "Gratefulness (shukr)," as understood in Islam, is a two-way street between God and man.

[689] The reference seems to be to the Man of the Mole, who probably was no longer in the area at the time of writing. The victory dispatch was written just before he was captured.

[690] In addition to stressing the merit of its author, the victory dispatch had as its primary purpose to recommend promotions and rewards for the officers and men, whether they were regular or irregular troops. This is most clearly stated in this paragraph, but it was also hinted at earlier in the dispatch.

When I proceeded to collect heads, those of Abū al-Ḥiml, Abū al-ʿAdhāb, and Abū al-Baghl were found.[691] // Al-Nuʿmān reportedly was killed. I am, God willing, about to search for his corpse, take his head, and carry it with the other heads into the presence of the Commander of the Faithful. [2243]

On Monday, al-Muḥarram 26, 291 (Monday, December 19, 903), the Man of the Mole was brought into al-Raqqah, appearing before the people on a Bactrian camel, wearing a silken hood and a brocade cloak. Al-Muddaththir and al-Muṭawwaq were in front of him on two camels. Al-Muktafī then left his troops behind with Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and, accompanied by al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh, he went with the men of his inner circle, the pages, and the eunuchs from al-Raqqah to Baghdad. He took along the Qarmaṭian, al-Muddaththir, al-Muṭawwaq, and a number of those captured in battle. This was on Ṣafar 1, 291 (December 24, 903).

When the Caliph arrived at Baghdad, he ⌜reportedly⌝ considered bringing the Qarmaṭian into Madīnat al-Salām hanging from a stake[692] placed upon the back of an elephant. He ordered the demolition of the arcades of the gates through which the elephant was to pass, because they were too low for the stake. This was the case with Bāb al-Ṭāq, Bāb al-Ruṣāfah, and other gates. But then al-Muktafī reportedly found this plan objectionable. Damyānah, the page of Yāzmān, therefore had a chair made for the Qarmaṭian, which was mounted upon the back of the elephant. It reportedly rose two and a half cubits[693] above the elephant's back. On Monday morning, Rabīʿ I 2,[694] 291 (Monday, January 23, 904), al-Muktafī entered Madīnat al-Salām Baghdad. He was preceded by the captives on camels; they were in fetters and wore silken cloaks and hoods. Al-Muṭawwaq, a lad whose beard had not yet grown, was in the middle. He had a rounded[695]

---

691 R: "I found those...."

692 Daql "palm trunk."

693 That is about 1.25 m. The specific form of this "chair (kursī)" cannot be determined with any precision. See Sadan, Mobilier, 123ff.

694 R: "Rabīʿ I, 1."

695 Makhrūṭ, here translated "rounded" since it seems to refer to the shape rather than mean "smooth."

piece of wood placed in his mouth, which was tied to the back of his head, as if it were a bridle. This was done because, when he [2244] was brought into al-Raqqah, / / he vilified the people when they cursed him, and spit upon them. He was dealt with in this fashion lest he vilify anyone (on this occasion). Al-Muktafī then ordered the construction of a raised platform at the Old Oratory on the East Side. It was twenty square cubits wide and ten cubits high.[696] Steps were built to enable him to ascend it.

When al-Muktafī returned to Madīnat al-Salām, he left his troops behind in al-Raqqah with Muḥammad b. Sulaymān. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān now rounded up the officers, qāḍīs, and police chiefs of the Qarmaṭian in that region. He took them and put them in fetters. He and the officers left behind with him went down to Madīnat al-Salām on the Euphrates Road. On Thursday night, Rabīʿ I 12, [697] 291 (February 2, 904), he reached Bāb al-Anbār,[698] together with a number of officers, among them Khāqān al-Mufliḥī, Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundājīq, ⌜and others⌝. The officers who were in Baghdad were ordered to go and meet Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and escort him into the city. He entered with some seventy captives in front of him and went to al-Thurayyā where a robe of honor, a gold necklace, and two gold bracelets were bestowed upon him. All ⌜the officers⌝ who arrived with him received robes of honor, necklaces, and bracelets. They were given leave to return to their residences; the captives were ordered to prison.

While the Man of the Mole was in al-Muktafī's prison, he reportedly took a bowl[699] from the table that was brought in to him. Smashing it, he took a piece and cut one of his veins. He lost [696] An area ten by ten meters wide is not very large, and the five-meter high platform must have been very crowded. See Balawī, Sīrat Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn, 269, for a similar platform erected in connection with the punishment of the followers of al-ʿAbbās, the son of Ibn Ṭūlūn. For the Old Oratory, see above, n. 27.

---

[697] R: "in the middle of Rabīʿ I."

[698] See Lassner, Topography, map VI, no. 6.

[699] Sukurrajah "bowl" refers to a small dish to hold side dishes (see Kindermann, Über die guten Sitten, 61). The one here was most likely made of glass, rather than china or wood.

much blood, but he then tied his hand.[700] When the person in charge of serving him noticed // it, he asked him why he had [2245] done it. He replied, "My blood got all stirred up, and I let it out."[701] He was left alone, until he was well again and his strength returned.

On Monday, Rabīʿ I 23, 291 (Monday, February 13, 904), al-Muktafī ordered the officers and pages to be present at the raised platform he had ordered built. Great throngs went out to attend. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad al-Wāthiqī, who was at the time the chief of police in Madīnat al-Salām, and Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, the secretary of the army, came to the raised platform and took their seats on it. Brought on camels to the platform were the captives whom al-Muktafī had brought along from al-Raqqah and those whom Muḥammad b. Sulaymān had brought. There were also Qarmaṭians rounded up[702] at al-Kūfah and imprisoned, Baghdādīs who held Qarmaṭian beliefs, ⌜and⌝ some ⌜riffraff from other places who were not Qarmaṭians⌝. They remained on the camels, with two armed guards in charge of each one of them; they reportedly numbered some three hundred and twenty or three hundred and sixty. The Qarmaṭian al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh, known as the Man of the Mole, together with his cousin, known as al-Muddaththir, was brought upon a mule carrying the two in a covered litter. A number of horsemen and foot soldiers were with them. They were brought up to the raised platform and seated on it. Thirty-four of the captives were now brought forward. Their hands and feet were cut off, and they were decapitated one after the other. Each man was seized and spread out face down. His right hand was cut off and tossed from the raised platform and circulated below, so that the people could see it. Then his left foot // was cut off, ⌜then his left hand⌝, then his right foot, and [2246] whatever was cut off was tossed down. Then he was seated, his head was stretched and chopped off, and both head and corpse [700] That is, he applied a tourniquet to his forearm (yad) to stop the flow of blood from the cut vein.

[701] The Man of the Mole apparently attempted suicide, but when he lost courage to go through with it, he did not want to admit it, because he did not want to appear fainthearted and, in particular, he did not want to admit to an action that was highly objectionable from the religious point of view. He described his action medically as a rather clumsy attempt at bloodletting for a sanguine indisposition.

[702] R: ḥumilū "carried (from)."

were tossed down. A small number of captives made a clamor pleading and swearing that they were not Qarmaṭians.

When the execution of those thirty-four individuals who reportedly included prominent and important men of the Qarmaṭian was finished, al-Muddaththir was brought forward. His hands and feet were cut off, and he was decapitated. Then the Qarmaṭian was brought forward. He was given two hundred lashes. Then his hands and feet were cut off, and he was cauterized,[703] whereupon he lost consciousness. Firewood was then taken, kindled, and placed upon his sides and belly. He started to open his eyes, but then closed them again. When it was feared that he might die, he was decapitated. His head was raised upon a piece of wood, and those upon the platform and all the people exclaimed, "God is great!"

After the Qarmaṭian was killed, the officers and those present there left to see what would be done with him, while al-Wāthiqī with a number of his men remained until the second evening prayer when the ⌜other⌝ captives who were brought to the raised platform had been decapitated. Then he left. On the following morning, the heads of those killed were carried from the Oratory to the ⌜Bridge. The corpse of the Qarmaṭian was hung at the foot of the ⌝Upper Bridge ⌜in Baghdad⌝. On Wednesday (February 15), the corpses of those killed were thrown into ⌜pits⌝ dug beside the raised platform, which were then filled. After several days, orders
[2247] were given to demolish the raised platform, and this was done. / /

On Rabīʿ II 14, 291 (March 5, 904), al-Qāsim b. Sīmā arrived at Baghdad via the Euphrates Road from the region under his jurisdiction. He was accompanied by one of the Banū al-ʿUllayṣ, one of the Qarmaṭian's men, who had come to him for a guarantee of safe-conduct. His patronymic was Abū Muḥammad,[704] and he was one of the dāʿīs of the Qarmaṭian. The reason why he sought a guarantee of safe-conduct was that the central authorities had corresponded with him and promised to treat him well if [703] Cauterization was the normal procedure after amputation. Here it served the purpose of prolonging the torture, as it was feared that the Man of the Mole might die too quickly.

[704] As indicated in R and ʿArīb, 5, as well as Ibn al-Athīr, he was Abū Muḥammad Ismāʿīl b. al-Nuʿmān. See above, n. 660. He was killed in this year.

he, in particular, were to seek a guarantee of safe-conduct. They did that because he was the only Qarmaṭian chieftain left in the Syrian region. He was a mawlā of the Banū al-ʿUllayṣ and was called Ismāʿīl b. al-Nuʿmān. At the time of the battle, he had taken refuge with a number of the Banū al-ʿUllayṣ in some obscure region and thus escaped. He then wished to seek a guarantee of safe-conduct and declare his loyalty, because he was afraid for his life. He and those with him, some sixty men, arrived at Madīnat al-Salām and were granted guarantees of safe-conduct. They were well treated and presents of money were brought to them. He and those with him were sent out to Raḥbat Mālik b. Ṭawq together with al-Qāsim b. Sīmā, and stipends[705] were granted to them. After al-Qāsim b. Sīmā arrived with them in the region under his jurisdiction, they stayed with him for a while. Then they conspired to betray him. Becoming aware of their plan, he lost no time doing away with them by putting them to the sword; some of them, however, he made captives. The remainder of the Banū al-ʿUllayṣ and their mawlās were deterred and humbled. After they had stayed for a while in the environs of al-Samāwah, the evil Zikrawayh corresponded with them. He informed them that it had been revealed to him[706] that the man known as al-Shaykh and his brother would be killed, and that his imām, who would be revealed to him, would appear after their death and be victorious. / / [2248]

On Thursday, Jumādā I 9, 291 (Thursday, March 29, 904), al-Muktafī married his son Abū Aḥmad Muḥammad to the daughter of ⌜Abū al-Ḥusayn⌝ al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh. The dowry was one hundred thousand dīnārs.[707]

---

[705] More precisely, it seems, allotments of food as monthly rations, rather than money.

[706] That is, he had known in advance that his two sons would die and by the same token he was sure of the future leader who would lead them to victory.

[707] For Muḥammad b. al-Muktafī, see above, n. 604. ʿArīb, 76, speaks of the sumptuous wedding banquet in honor of the marriage of a daughter of (the by then deceased) al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh to Muḥammad b. al-Muktafī in the year 306 (918-9).

At the end of Jumādā ⌜I⌝, 291 (April 19, 904), a letter from the region of Jubbā[708] ⌜reportedly⌝ reached Baghdad. It mentioned that a flash flood in a (dry) river reached Jubbā from the mountain and inundated about thirty farsakhs (180 km).[709] A large number of people as well as cattle drowned, and the crops were inundated. Residences[710] and villages were ruined. The bodies of twelve hundred drowned persons were recovered besides those who were not found.

On Sunday, Rajab 1, 291 (Saturday, May 19, 904), al-Muktafī bestowed robes of honor upon Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, the secretary of the army, and a number of distinguished officers, among them Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundājīq, Khalīfah b. al-Mubārak, who was known as Abū al-Agharr, the two sons of Kayghalagh, Bunduqah b. Kumushjūr, and others. He ordered the officers to obey Muḥammad b. Sulaymān loyally. Still wearing the robes of honor, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān left and encamped in his tent at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah. A number of officers who had been mobilized encamped with him. They were to depart for Damascus and Egypt in order to seize the provinces from Hārūn b. Khumārawayh, for the central authorities had come to realize that Hārūn and those with him were weak, having suffered the loss of men killed by the Qarmaṭian. On Rajab 6, 291 (May 24, [2249] 904), // Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and the men attached to him—about ten thousand—left Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah. He ordered them to make every possible effort to advance quickly.

On Rajab 27, 291 (June 14, 904), a dispatch arrived from Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad who was in Khurāsān, and it was read in the two Friday Mosques of Madīnat al-Salām. In it, Ismāʿīl mentioned that the Turks had marched against the Muslims with a large army and many people. There were seven hundred Turkish tents in the camp, and they were those reserved exclusively for their chief-[708] For Jubbā in Khūzistān/al-Ahwāz, the home of the great theologian Abū ʿAlī al-Jubbāʾī, see, for instance, Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 17; Ḥudūd al-ʿālam, trans. Minorsky, 130; Samʿānī, Ansāb, III, 186, who speaks of Jubbā as a village in al-Baṣrah; EI[2], s. v. al-Djubbāʾī.

[709] Whether this is meant as an area of one hundred and eighty square km or merely as the length of the area affected, it seems too large a figure.

[710] R: al-nawāḥī "regions."

tains! Ismāʿīl had given one of his officers command of an army and sent him off against them.[711] It had been publicly announced that people should volunteer to join, and many did. The commander of the army had marched with the Muslims who were with him against the Turks. The Muslims had come upon them when they did not expect it, and had attacked them in the morning. A large number of them had been killed, and the rest had fled. Permission had been given to loot their camp, and the Muslims had returned to their place safe and with booty.

In Shaʿbān, 291 (June 18-July 16, 904), word arrived in Baghdad that the Byzantine ruler had sent ten crosses[712] with one hundred thousand men against the border towns and that a number of them had moved on al-Ḥadath. They had raided and burned, and they had captured every Muslim they had been able to.

In Ramaḍān, 291 (July 17-August 15, 904), a dispatch from al-Qāsim b. Sīmā reached ⌜the central authorities⌝ from al-Raḥbah. In it, he mentioned that the Arab tribesmen of the Banū ʿUllayṣ and their mawlās, who had been with the Qarmaṭian and had then sought and obtained guarantees of safe-conduct from the central authorities and from himself, had broken (their word) and betrayed their trust. They had planned to attack al-Raḥbah on the day of fast-breaking [Shawwāl 1 (August 16)], while people were engaged in the holiday prayer, and to kill whomever they could reach as well as to burn and to loot. "I used a ruse against them and eventually killed and captured one hundred and fifty // of them, not counting those who drowned in the Euphrates. I [2250] am bringing the captives, including a number of their leaders, and the heads of the slain."

---

[711] Text: "him"; R: ilayhim.

[712] Ibn al-Athīr interprets this to mean that each army unit of ten thousand men had one cross. Vasiliev, II, 163, apparently following Ibn al-Athīr, speaks of ten legions. On another occasion, ʿArīb, 34, 11. 12f., mentions Byzantine banners decorated with crosses of gold and silver.

At the end of Ramaḍān, 291 (August 15, 904), a dispatch ⌜from al-Raqqah⌝ arrived at Baghdad from Abū Maʿadd[713] concerning news reaching him from Ṭarsūs. The dispatch indicated that God had given victory to a man known as Ghulām Zurāfah[714] in a raid then undertaken by him against the Byzantines at a city called Anṭāliyah[715] located on the seashore—they asserted that it equaled Constantinople. Ghulām Zurāfah had conquered it forcibly by the sword. He reportedly killed five thousand men and captured a similar number, while rescuing four thousand (Muslim) captives. He seized[716] sixty Byzantine ships and loaded them with the booty he had made: silver, gold, goods, and slaves. He estimated the share of every participant in that raid, and it came to a thousand dīnārs. The Muslims rejoiced at that. "I have speedily forwarded this dispatch of mine, so that the wazīr will know about the event. Written on Thursday, Ramaḍān 10, 291 (Thursday, July 26, 904)." The dispatch arrived at Baghdad and was read in the two Friday Mosques.

In this year, al-Qāsim b. Sīmā reached Baghdad with the captives and the heads of the (slain) Banū ʿUllayṣ. The captives numbered some forty, and the heads some sixty. The heads included that of Abū Muḥammad Ismāʿīl b. al-Nuʿmān al-ʿUllayṣī.

*On Wednesday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 6, 291 (Wednesday, September 19, 904), al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh died. On the day after his 713 Text: "Maʿdān"; read Maʿadd as in R and ʿArīb, 6. The editor of ʿArīb assumes that the individual was identical with Nizār b. Muḥammad. See above, n. 490.

---

714 Zurāfah was presumably the court official who briefly played a significant role during the caliphate of al-Muntaṣir. The page (ghulām) of Zurāfah is mentioned by Masʿūdī, Murūj, II, 318f., ed. Pellat, II, 45. See Canard, Sources arabes, 38. With reference to Kindī, Wulāh, 245, Canard, Sources arabes, 45, n. 3, states that the name of Ghulām Zurāfah was Rashīq al-Wardamī, but he also quotes, on p. 404, from Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 180, that Leon, Ghulām Zurāfah, attacked Thessalonica in 290 (903). The data are hard to reconcile, and further clarification is needed. See also Canard, in Vasiliev, II, 163, n. 2.

715 Modern Antalya. It is not surprising that the reading Anṭākiyah appears frequently, as in R (and possibly C) and ʿArīb. See also Canard, Sources arabes, 18, 56, 167, 259, 270. The indicated location rules out Antioch (Anṭākiyah), but the comparison with Constantinople appears more applicable to Antioch than Antalya, even though the latter was an impressive site.

716 R (see also C): wajada "found."

death, al-Muktafī appointed al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan[717] as wazīr. Al-ʿAbbās reportedly attended several meetings on that day. He became extremely nervous after mounting (his horse to return home), and on the way to his residence from the Caliph's palace he asked four times for a drink of water.*

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās ⌜b. Muḥammad⌝. / / [2251]

[717] For al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan, see Sourdel, Vizirat, 359ff. For his death in connection with the Ibn al-Muʿtazz affair, see text below, 2282.

The ⌜Important⌝ Events of the Year 292

(NOVEMBER 13, 904 - NOVEMBER 1, 905)

Among the events was the dispatch, by Nizār b. Muḥammad, of a man from al-Baṣrah to the central authorities in Baghdad. The man had reportedly intended to rebel against the central authorities and had gone to Wāsiṭ. Nizār sent someone in search of him, and he arrested the man in Wāsiṭ and had him brought to al-Baṣrah. Nizār also seized people there who had reportedly declared allegiance to the man. He now sent all of them by boat to Baghdad, and they stopped at the Port of the Baṣrans.[718] ⌜Nizār sent a number of officers to the Port of the Baṣrans.⌝ The man was mounted upon the Bactrian camel,[719] while a child, a son of his, was in front of him on a camel. Accompanying him were thirty-nine[720] men on camels, all of them wearing silken hoods ⌜and cloaks⌝. Most of them pleaded for help; they cried and swore that they were innocent and knew nothing of the charges brought against them. They were led to al-Muktafī's palace by way of al-Tammārīn, ⌜Bāb⌝ al-Karkh, and al-Khuld.[721] Al-Muktafī ordered them remanded to the prison known as the New Prison and had them incarcerated there.

---

[718] This appears to have been the place where boats from al-Baṣrah usually stopped near Baghdad.

[719] The use of the definite article here seems to indicate that a particular Bactrian camel was usually employed for parading suspected heretics and rebels.

[720] R and ʿArīb, 7: "thirty-seven." This also seems to be the reading of B.

[721] Al-Tammārīn apparently was the street on which the date merchants were concentrated. For Bāb al-Karkh, see Lassner, Topography, 247, and, for the great palace al-Khuld built by al-Manṣūr on the Tigris, op. cit., 55, 243, map V, no. 5.

In al-Muḥarram, 292, (November 13-December 12, 904), the Byzantine Andronikos[722] raided Mar'ash and its environs. The inhabitants of al-Maṣṣīṣah and Ṭarsūs marched out to combat. Abū al-Rijāl b. Abī Bakkār [723] and a number of Muslims were mortally wounded.

In al-Muḥarram, 292, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān reached the borders of Egypt to fight Hārūn b. Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad. Al-Muktafī dispatched Damyānah, the page of Yāzmān, from Baghdad / / with orders to go to Egypt by sea, enter the Nile, and [2252] cut off supplies from the troops in Egypt. He went and entered the Nile as far as al-Jisr,[724] where he stayed, making things difficult for the Egyptians.

Muḥammad b. Sulaymān advanced against them with mounted troops. When he was close to al-Fusṭāṭ, he corresponded with the officers there. The first to come out to him was Badr al-Ḥammāmī, who was the supreme chief. That broke their resistance, and a procession of Egyptian officers and others followed to seek guarantees of safe-conduct. When Hārūn and those remaining with him saw that, they advanced against Muḥammad b. Sulaymān, and battles reportedly took place between them. Somewhat later, dissension[725] broke out among Hārūn's men, and they fought one another. When Hārūn went out to quiet them, one of the Maghribīs hurled a javelin[726] at him and killed him. Informed about his death, Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and those with him entered al-Fusṭāṭ, took possession of the houses of the Ṭūlūnid family and their associates, and seized all of them; they numbered about ten men. He put them in fetters, incarcerated them, and confiscated their property. He then wrote a victory dispatch (to Baghdad).

---

722 He is identical with the Patrikios Andronikos who two years later sought a guarantee of safe-conduct and went to Baghdad. See below, 2276. For the passage, see Canard, Sources arabes, 19, and, for an analysis of the events involving Andronikos, see Canard, in Vasiliev, II, 181ff.; Rydén (above, n. 164).

723 I have no further information about him.

724 The precise location of "The Bridge (al-Jisr)" cannot, it seems, be determined.

725 Group or tribal sentiment ('aṣabiyyah) was understandably strong in the Egyptian forces which were composed of various ethnic groups, and gave rise to many quarrels and "dissension."

726 For zānah "javelin," the better known, Arabic word sahm "arrow" is used by 'Arīb, 7; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 111 (quoting Sibṭ Ibn al-Jawzī). Lane, 1273a, refers to zānah as a specifically Daylamite weapon.

The battle took place in Ṣafar, 292 (December 13, 904-January 11, 905). Word was sent to Muḥammad b. Sulaymān ordering him to move all the Ṭūlūnids and the officers associated with them[727] out of Egypt and Syria. Not a single one of them was to be left behind, and they were all to be sent to Baghdad. Muḥammad b. Sulaymān complied (with the order).

On Rabīʿ I 3, 292 (January 13, 905), the wall at the head of the First Bridge on the East Side—it was the wall of a house that had belonged to ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir—fell upon (the [2253] corpse of) the Qarmaṭian al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh // which hung nearby and crushed[728] it. No trace of it was found afterwards.

In Ramaḍān, 292 (July 7-August 5, 905), a report reached the central authorities in Baghdad indicating that one of the Egyptian officers, an officer named Ibrāhīm and known as al-Khalījī,[729] had left Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and stayed behind at the most distant borders of Egypt with a number of troops and others whom he had won over. Marching on Egypt[730] in opposition to the central authorities, he had been joined by a number of people ⌜bent upon sedition⌝, so that his ranks had swelled. When he reached Egypt (al-Fusṭāṭ), ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī, who was then in charge of security there, had intended to engage him in combat, but he had been unable to do so in view of the large force with al-Khalījī.

---

[727] Maqrīzī, Khiṭaṭ, I, 322, speaks of twenty descendants of Ibn Ṭūlūn but gives no numbers for the officers.

[728] R: fa-baṭaḥahū "flattened."

[729] Ṭabarī also refers to him as Ibn Khalīj; R, like Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 236, ed. Pellat, V, 187, uses Ibn al-Khalījī. It appears to be unclear whether Khalījī, or rather Khalanjī, is the correct form. Egyptian historiography refers to him as Muḥammad b. ʿAlī. See Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 147, 153-55. This is probably more correct than Ṭabarī's Ibrāhīm, which may have been influenced by the Ibrāhīm al-Khalījī mentioned earlier, see text above, III, 2027. Al-Khalījī started a local Egyptian resistance movement against the caliphate as represented by its governor ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī, after the de facto independence of Egypt established by the Ṭūlūnids had come to an end. According to Egyptian historiography, he enjoyed considerable popular support. See Kindī, Wulāh, 259-63, 267; Ibn Taghrībirdī, loc. cit. At the end, Ibn Taghrībirdī felt compelled to reflect upon the irony—not uncommon in national liberation movements—that the rebellion which was intended to improve the political position of Egypt led to even greater destruction than was caused by the ʿAbbāsid reconquest under Muḥammad b. Sulaymān. Al-Khalījī disappears from view after he was captured and brought to Baghdad, see text below, 2267f.

[730] That is, al-Fusṭāṭ.

As a result, he had drawn away from al-Khalījī, and after evacuating al-Fusṭāṭ, he had retreated to Alexandria. Al-Khalījī had then entered al-Fusṭāṭ.

Now, in this year, al-Muktafī mobilized Fātik, the mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, to fight al-Khalījī and establish order in the West.[731] The Caliph attached Badr al-Ḥammāmī to Fātik, making him Fātik's adviser in this undertaking. He also attached to him a number of officers and many troops. On Shawwāl 7, 292 (August 12, 905), robes of honor were bestowed upon Fātik and Badr al-Ḥammāmī when they departed for Egypt on their mission. // [2254] Ordered to leave quickly, they marched off on Shawwāl 12, 292 (August 17, 905).

On Shawwāl 15, 292 (August 20, 905), Rustum b. Bardū[732] entered Ṭarsūs as governor of the city and the Syrian border towns.

In this year, the Muslims and Byzantines undertook ransom negotiations. The first day of the negotiations was Dhū al-Qaʿdah 2, 292 (September 27, 905). The total number of Muslims ransomed was reportedly about twelve hundred. Following this the Byzantines reneged (on the arrangements agreed upon) and departed, and the Muslims went back with their remaining Byzantine captives. The ransom negotiations and armistice had (originally) been arranged by Abū al-ʿAshā'ir and the qāḍī Ibn Mukram.[733] When that raid of Andronikos against the inhabitants of Marʿash took place and he killed Abū al-Rijāl and others, Abū al-ʿAshā'ir was removed, and Rustum was appointed (governor). The ransom negotiations were therefore in his hands. The person in charge of [731] Talbi, Émirat, 653, has attempted to relate this reference to the "West (al-Maghrib)" to the contemporary unrest in Ifrīqiyah, but as seen from Baghdad, Egypt is probably meant here.

---

[732] Rustum is called al-Farghānī in Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 192. See Canard, Sources arabes, 406, also 19. His father's name was omitted by ʿArīb, 8. The reason for Rustum's appointment is given in the following paragraph. He is mentioned last in 299 (911). See text below, 2286.

[733] Possibly, ʿAbdallāh b. Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Mukram, who is mentioned as a qāḍī for the years 311-13. See Kindī, Wulāh, 481, 483 (also 531-36, from Ibn Ḥajar, Rafʿ al-iṣr); Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 213, l. 18. He appears knowledgeable about Byzantine-Christian matters in a story reported in Tanūkhī, Nishwār, I, 52 (there we find the correct text, as against the edition of Margoliouth, Table-Talk, 30).

the ransom negotiations for the Byzantines was a man called Asṭānah.[734]

In this year, Mubārak al-Qummī was sent to the camp of Muḥammad b. Sulaymān on two hundred swift camels. Written orders to arrest Muḥammad were sent with him to the officers who were with Muḥammad, and he was arrested.

*In this year, the floodwaters in Baghdad were exceedingly high,[735] making Baghdādīs afraid of drowning. The houses on both banks of the Tigris were generally destroyed, and the waters reportedly gushed forth in the shops of the sack merchants[736] in Baghdad.

The Tigris then rose a second time to an even greater height. The reason for this was that al-Muktafī had constructed a building at the place[737] known as al-Ḥasanī, and had reportedly extended its foundation sixty cubits (thirty m) into the Tigris. When the high waters reached the building at the time of the flooding, they did not find an outlet and turned back, thus rising high in Baghdad and its environs. Many people thought that (the flooding) resulted from the rising groundwater.

A stupid and foolish Baghdādī invented a dream. He mentioned[738] that he had seen the Prophet in his sleep. He said that God wanted to bring misfortune upon them. "I asked God about their affair when they had already been taken seven days (...., and I was told, '....),[739] so order them to go out into the countryside and call out to God, and He will lift the misfortune from them.' "

The populace talked about al-Baṣrah having been inundated by this flood. Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) says: I wrote to al-Baṣrah about this flood that affected Baghdad and its environs, from [734] Perhaps, Usṭāthah, that is, Eustathios (Usṭāth)?

---

[735] The flood is mentioned briefly in Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 50; Ibn al-Athīr; Ibn Taghrībirdī, III, 157, who says that it occurred in Jumādā I (March 11-April, 9, 905) and that the waters rose twenty-one cubits.

[736] Dakākīn aṣḥāb al-jawālīq.

[737] Probably, the Ḥasanī palace is meant, but "place (mawḍiʿ)" is used here.

[738] The vocalization as a passive is indicated in the manuscript but seems unlikely.

[739] The text is corrupt. This is particularly regrettable since some interesting animadversion on the role of God in human misfortune appears to have been made here by Ṭabarī.

above[740] the border of ʿUkbarā and further up and down from the lowest part of Baghdad, and we found no trace of it (in the region of al-Baṣrah).*

In this year, a letter from Bassām al-Kurdī[741] reached Baghdad. He was stationed in a fortress of his between Byzantine and Muslim territory and engaged in keeping the truce between the Muslims and Byzantines. He mentioned that the Byzantine king had written to him, ordering him to rebuild the bridges over the Jayḥān and improve the road for him, for he planned to march on Ṭarsūs. The agent in Ṭarsūs sent (the message) on to the central authorities.

In this year, the emissary of the Byzantine king came to Ṭarsūs in connection with ransom negotiations.

In this year, Ṭughj b. Juff and his brother Wāzar,[742] both officers of Ibn Ṭūlūn, came to Baghdad with all the Ṭūlūnid officers.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik ⌜b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad.⌝

[740] The probable geographical reference is, it seems, not based on the course of the river as "up"stream and downstream, but upon the meaning of above as south and below as north. It thus signifies flooding south of ʿUkbarā to northern Baghdad and south into Baghdad.

[741] I have no further information about him.

[742] On Ṭughj and his brother Badr, see above, nn. 77 and 155. No interpretation of the clearly written w'zr here other than as the name of another brother of Ṭughj is possible. Wāzar seems otherwise unattested as a Persian name. It can, however, easily be explained as meaning "worker" or the like. In spite of the evidence of R, the correct form might be Warāz, which is widely attested. See Hinz, Altiranisches Sprachgut, 255.

The arrival of Ṭughj in Baghdad with his (unnamed) son and brother is dated on Monday, Shaʿbān 16, 292 (Sunday, June 23, 905), in Ibn al-ʿAdīm, Zubdat al-ḥalab, I, 91. See also Ibn Saʿīd, Mughrib, ed. Tallqvist, text, 7, trans., 22; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 146.

The Events of the Year 293

(NOVEMBER 2, 905 - OCTOBER 21, 906)

Among the events was a report that arrived at Baghdad on Ṣafar 24, 293 (December 25, 905). It indicated that al-Khalījī, who had seized power in Egypt, had attacked Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh and a number of officers near al-ʿArīsh and routed them ignominiously.[743] A number of officers / / stationed in Madīnat al-Salām, among them Ibrāhīm b. Kayghalagh, were mobilized to go (to Egypt), and they did so.

[2255]

On Rabīʿ I[744] 7, 293 (January 6, 906), one of the officers of Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad ⌜b. ʿAmr⌝ b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār, who was known as Abū Qābūs,[745] left the camp of the Sijistānīs[746] and arrived at Madīnat al-Salām seeking a guarantee of safe-conduct. This was because Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad, who was reportedly preoccupied with amusement and hunting, had gone to Sijistān for hunting and recreation. Power in Fārs was then seized by al-Layth b. ʿAlī ⌜b. al-Layth⌝[747] and Subkarā,[748] the mawlā of ʿAmr ⌜b. al-Layth⌝, with al-Layth governing in the jurisdiction which was nominally Ṭāhir's. They became estranged from Abū Qābūs, and as a result, Abū Qābūs left them and went to the Caliph's court in Baghdad. ⌜The Caliph received him⌝, bestowed robes of honor upon him and upon a number of the men with him, presented him with gifts, and honored him. Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad ⌜b. ʿAmr b. al-Layth⌝

---

[743] The battle took place on al-Muḥarram 3, 293 (November 4, 905). See Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 153.

[744] R: "Rabīʿ II."

[745] Abū Qābūs al-Khurāsānī is further mentioned in ʿArīb, 53, sub anno 302 (914-5). All the Ṭabarī manuscripts have al-Qābūs.

[746] That is, Ṭāhir's forces in Sijistān made up primarily of local troops.

[747] Al-Layth was a cousin of Ṭāhir's father. He died in al-Raqqah in 316 (928). See ʿArīb, 139.

[748] The vocalization of this name is not certain. Subkarā died in 305 (917-8) in Baghdad.

then wrote to the central authorities asking them to return Abū Qābūs to him. He mentioned that he had entrusted him with some administrative duties in Fārs and that Abū Qābūs had collected taxes and had taken the proceeds along with him. Should Abū Qābūs not be returned to him, Ṭāhir asked that an accounting be made of the money from Fārs which Abū Qābūs had taken along with him and which he had been forced to give up.[749] The central authorities did not grant Ṭāhir any of these requests.

In this month [Rabīʿ I, 293 (December 31, 905-January 29, 906)], word arrived in Baghdad that a brother of ⌜al-Ḥusayn b.⌝ Zikrawayh, known as the Man of the Mole, had appeared in al-Dāliyah with some men having come from the Euphrates Road, and some Arab tribesmen and brigands had joined him. He marched / / on Damascus with them taking the desert road. He [2256] caused trouble in the region and fought its inhabitants. Al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān ⌜b. Ḥamdūn⌝ was mobilized to go out against him, and he left with a large number of troops. The Qarmaṭian's move on Damascus took place in Jumādā I, 293 (February 28-March 29, 906). Following this, word arrived at Baghdad that he had moved on Ṭabariyyah[750] Its inhabitants refused to let him enter the city, so he fought them and eventually entered the city. He killed most of the men and women there and looted the city, following which he went back to the desert region.

In Rabīʿ II, 293 (January 30-February 27, 906), word arrived at Baghdad that the dāʿī in the Yemen had moved on the city of Ṣanʿā'. Its inhabitants fought him, but he overcame and killed them; only a few of them escaped. He then seized power in all the other cities of the Yemen.[751]

---

[749] Ṭāhir suggests that the money he accuses Abū Qābūs of having embezzled was taken away from Abū Qābūs in Baghdad in exchange for the friendly reception accorded him.

[750] That is, Tiberias.

[751] See above, n. 487, and, with reference to this passage, van Arendonk, Opkomst, 182, n. 2.

Resumption of the Report on the Affairs of Ibn Zikrawayh's Brother

The source for the following report is Muḥammad b. Dawūd b. al-Jarrāḥ: After the death of the Man of the Mole, the son of Zikrawayh b. Mihrawayh, a man named Abū Ghānim ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd,[752] who was a schoolteacher in a village called al-Zābūqah[753] in the administrative district of al-Fallūjah, was dispatched by Zikrawayh to circulate among the Kalb tribes and propagandize for his religious views among them. In order to disguise ⌜his activities⌝, he called himself Naṣr. Nobody accepted his propaganda except a man from the Banū Ziyād who was called Miqdām [2257] b. al-Kayyāl.[754] He inveigled on his behalf sections of // the Aṣbaghites who claimed Fāṭimid descent, as well as low-class ʿUllayṣ and vagabonds from all the other Kalb subtribes, and moved on the Syrian region.

The official of the central authorities in charge of Damascus and al-Urdunn (Province) was Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh. At the time, he was stationed in Egypt to fight Ibn Khalīj,[755] who had opposed Muḥammad b. Sulaymān and returned to Egypt (al-Fusṭāṭ) seizing power there. ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd seized the opportunity (of Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh's absence) to move on the cities of Buṣrā and Adhriʿāt, counties of the Ḥawrān, and al-Bathaniyyah. He fought their inhabitants and then offered them guarantees of safe-conduct. When they submitted, he killed their fighting men, took their women and children captive, and confiscated their property. ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd then traveled toward Damascus, where Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh had left behind a garrison of Egyptians with Ṣāliḥ b. al-Faḍl.[756] A number of them went out against ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿīd, but (the Qarmaṭians) overcame them, causing a bloodbath. Following this, they deceived them by extending [752] For the events concerning this man, see Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs," 51.

---

[753] Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 905, distinguishes this Zābūqah from the one at the outskirts of al-Baṣrah. The latter is connected with the Battle of the Camel fought in 36 (656). See text above, I, 3122ff. For al-Fallūjah, see *EI*², s. v. al-Fallūdja.

[754] There does not seem to exist any further information about him. See Halm, loc. cit.

[755] R: "al-Khalījī."

[756] I have found no further information about him other than that which is presented in Ṭabarī and ʿArīb.

guarantees of safe-conduct to them. They killed Ṣāliḥ and scattered his army. However, they had no hope of taking Damascus; for they had reached it earlier only to be repelled by its inhabitants. Therefore they moved on Ṭabariyyah, the capital of al-Urdunn. They were joined by a number of defectors from among the troops of Damascus.[757] Yūsuf b. Ibrāhīm b. Bughāmardī,[758] Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh's official in charge of al-Urdunn, attacked them, but they broke his resistance and offered him a guarantee of safe-conduct. They subsequently betrayed him, and, after killing him, they looted the capital of al-Urdunn, took the women captive, and killed a number of its inhabitants.

The central authorities despatched al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān and several distinguished officers to pursue them. // Al-Ḥusayn [2258] reached Damascus, after the enemies of God had entered Ṭabariyyah. When they learned about al-Ḥusayn, they turned toward al-Samāwah. Al-Ḥusayn went off to pursue them in the desert of al-Samāwah, while they moved from watering place to watering place and made them all unusable. Eventually they took refuge at two watering places known as al-Dimʿānah and al-Ḥālah.[759] Since he had no water, al-Ḥusayn gave up the pursuit and returned[760] to al-Raḥbah.

The Qarmaṭians with that seducer of theirs called Naṣr marched by night on the village of Hīt. In the morning of Shaʿbān 20,[761] 293 (June 16, 906), at sunrise, they arrived there unexpected. Naṣr looted the city's suburbs, killed all the inhabitants he could, burned down the residences, and looted the ships in the Euphrates port[762] of the city. He reportedly killed about two hundred of the local inhabitants, men, women, and children, and seized all the property ⌜and goods⌝ that he could. He reportedly loaded three thousand pack animals that were with him with about two

---

757 R: "a number of people who had escaped from Damascus."

758 See above, n. 181.

759 Al-Dimʿānah is described by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 598, as a watering place belonging to the Baḥr of the Zuhayr b. Janāb of the Kalb (see Caskel, Das genealogische Werk, table 285, I, 221a, 610a). For al-Ḥālah, see Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 361, s. v. Khālah. RC: "al-Dimghānah."

760 Since he came from Damascus, it would be more accurate to say that he continued to the Euphrates.

761 R and ʿArīb (11, l. 10), as apparently also B: "seven" (nights remaining, or Shaʿbān 22).

762 R has the expected furḍatihā. See also Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., DCCC.

hundred kurr bi-al-muʿaddal[763] of wheat and all the flour,[764] perfume, and stuff[765] that he needed. He stayed the rest of the day on which he had entered the city, as well as the following day, and then left for the desert ⌜after the evening prayer⌝. He obtained all that (booty) from the suburbs alone, for the inhabitants of the city itself were protected from him by the city wall. On account of this Qarmaṭian, Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundājīq marched to Hīt with a number of officers and a substantial army. After [2259] several days he was followed by Mu'nis al-Khādim.[766] //

The source for the following report is Muḥammad b. Dāwūd: The Qarmaṭians came to Hīt unexpectedly in the morning, but God safeguarded the city's inhabitants by means of the city wall. The central authorities then rushed Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundājīq against the Qarmaṭians. When the Qarmaṭians had stayed there only three nights, ⌜Muḥammad b. Isḥāq drew close⌝. They fled ⌜from him⌝ to the two watering places. When he wanted to pursue them, he found that they had made the watering places between him and themselves unusable. Camels, water skins, and provisions were dispatched to him from the center.[767] Al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān was given written orders to proceed against them from the direction of al-Raḥbah, so that he and Muḥammad b. Isḥāq could attack them jointly.

When the Kalbites noticed that the army was on their trail, they decided to assault and murder the enemy of God called Naṣr. One[768] of them, a man called al-Dhi'b b. al-Qā'im,[769] was responsible for the killing. He then went to (the Caliph's) court and [763] On determinations of the weight of kurr muʿaddal, see Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCCLIII; Lane, 2601b. For kurr, see also Wörterbuch, letter K, 106a. The kurr is commonly described as containing sixty donkey loads. If donkeys or mules are meant here, the kurr muʿaddal would amount to about fifteen such loads.

---

[764] Burr may be "flour" in contrast to ḥinṭah "wheat (grain)." "Linen cloth (bazz)" cannot be excluded, however, if "perfume" is correct.

[765] Saqaṭ occurs next to "rice" in the text above, III, 1550. It is explained as a kind of merchandise. See Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCXCIII. It may have a meaning similar to that of ḥuṭām (see below, n. 771). The proximity to "perfume" recalls safaṭ "container for cosmetics." See Lane, 1372b; Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 22, n. 3; Busse, "Hofbudget," 24. However, this word is not likely to be meant here.

[766] Text: "al-Khāzin"; read al-Khādim as in RC.

[767] Probably, al-ḥaḍrah refers here to Baghdad.

[768] ʿArīb, 11, ll. 19f., summarizes the rest of the paragraph: "They used his head to approach Muḥammad b. Kundāj."

[769] In Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 374, he is called Abū al-Dhi'b (?).

used what he had done as a means of approaching (the Caliph) and seeking guarantees of safe-conduct for the rest of the Kalb. He was rewarded and credited for what he had undertaken, and his people were no longer pursued. He remained several days, and then fled. The vanguards of Muḥammad b. Isḥāq came upon the head[770] of the man called Naṣr. They cut it off and brought it to Madīnat al-Salām.

The Qarmaṭians thereafter fought among themselves. This eventually led to bloodshed. Miqdām b. al-Kayyāl escaped to the territory of the Ṭayyi' with the things[771] he had seized. A group of them who disliked what the Qarmaṭians were doing went to the Banū Asad, who were staying in the region of ʿAyn al-Tamr, and asked them for protection. They sent a delegation to the central authorities to apologize / / for what they had done and to [2260] ask that (official) approval be given to them so that they could remain under the protection of the Banū Asad. Their request was granted.

The remaining wicked adherents of the religion of the Qarmaṭian reached the two watering places. The central authorities now sent written orders to Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān to resume the attempt to uproot them. Zikrawayh dispatched one of his *dāʿī*s to them, a farmer from the Sawād named al-Qāsim b. Aḥmad b. ʿAlī, who was known as Abū Muḥammad[772] and came from the rural district of Nahr Malḥātā.[773] He was sent to inform them that the action of al-Dhi'b b. al-Qā'im had estranged them from Zikrawayh[774] and that they had become renegades from the (true) religion. The time had arrived, however, for them to come out. Forty thousand men had declared their allegiance to him in al-Kūfah, and four hundred thousand in the Kūfan countryside. Their appointed day was the one mentioned by God in His Book 770 In the context, the corpse, with the head still attached, must be meant.

---

771 Like saqaṭ (above, n. 765), ḥuṭām generally means something like worthless castoffs, but the meaning of "hay," expressly indicated in Dozy, may apply here.

772 There is no further information about him beyond what is found in Ṭabarī.

773 Text: "Talḥānah"; read "Malḥātā," as found in R and supported by the reading in C. Aramaic malḥāthā "salt regions/mines" would be an appropriate name. Tallḥānah seems less likely.

774 Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 47, l. 3, adds, no doubt from a recension of Ṭabarī: "and made his heart heavy against them." Miskawayh's text is incorporated in the text of the Leiden edition.

in connection with Moses, the man spoken to by God,[775] and Moses's enemy Pharaoh, where He says: "Your appointed day is a day of splendor, and it should be that the people will assemble in the early morning."[776] Zikrawayh ordered them to conceal their business and to make it appear that they were setting out for Syria, while, in fact, they were to march on al-Kūfah, where they were to arrive on the morning of the Day of Slaughtering, Thursday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 10, 293 (Thursday, October 2, 906). They would not be prevented from entering al-Kūfah. He would then appear and fulfill his promise to them which his messengers used to convey to them. They should bring al-Qāsim b. Aḥmad with them.

They obeyed his command[777] and reached the gate of al-Kūfah, just as the people returned from their place of prayer with Isḥāq b. ʿImrān,[778] the official representing the central authorities [2261] there. The number of those / / who reached the gate of al-Kūfah on that day reportedly consisted of approximately eight hundred[779] horsemen headed by al-Dandānī Zikrawayh[780] b. Mihrawayh, who was from al-Ṣaw'ar[781] or, according to another report, from Junbulā'. The horsemen had coats of mail and breastplates and a

---

[775] The well-known epithet of Moses, based on Qur. 4:164 and occurring but once in the standard collections of ḥadīth. See Bukhārī, Ṣaḥīḥ, in Ibn Ḥajar, Fatḥ, XVII, 252; Wörterbuch, letter K, 336a.

[776] Qur. 20:59.

[777] R: ra'yahū "his opinion."

[778] Isḥāq b. ʿImrān was removed from his official position in al-Kūfah and its environs at the end of Ramaḍān, 303 (April 7, 916), and he died on Wednesday, Ṣafar 9 (not 7), 306 (Wednesday, July 22, 918). See ʿArīb, 58, 76. He was attacked in a satirical poem by Ibn Bassām al-Bassāmī (Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 259f., ed. Pellat, V, 197f.).

[779] R: "two hundred."

[780] Text: "al-Dhablānī"; read "al-Dandānī" as in RC. The same nisbah occurs in connection with Zikrawayh in Baghdādī, Farq, 267, whose information may, however, go in some manner back to Ṭabarī. See also Halkin's translation, Moslem Schisms, 112. For further possible occurrences of Dandān in Qarmaṭian history, see L. Massignon, "Esquisse," 331; Halm, Kosmologie, 5, n. 22, 95; al-Baghdādī, Farq, 266, trans. Halkin, 108f. The nisbah al-Dandānī is listed in Samʿānī, Ansāb V, 383, but Samʿānī does not indicate what it refers to. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 611, refers to a village Dandanah in the region of Wāsiṭ, but the short vowel in the second syllable makes any relationship to Dandānī dubious.

[781] According to the text below, al-Ṣaw'ar was located eight km from al-Qādisiyyah. It was celebrated as the location of a slaughtering contest (muʿāqarah), in which the father of the poet al-Farazdaq participated. See Naqā'id, for instance, 624, 771, 953, 999, 1080 (Leiden 1905-12). The Naqā'id were the source of Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 430f.

fine outfit.[782] They were accompanied by a number of foot soldiers on pack animals. They attacked the ordinary prople they came upon, despoiling a number of them and killing about twenty. The people lost no time in going to al-Kūfah. They entered the city and sounded the alarm, whereupon Isḥāq b. ʿImrān rose with his men. About a hundred Qarmaṭian horsemen entered the city of al-Kūfah from the gate known as Bāb Kindah.[783] The people and a number of men from the government forces gathered and pelted them with stones, fought against them, and threw parapets[784] upon them. About twenty Qarmaṭians were killed, and the Qarmaṭians were forced from the city. Isḥāq ⌜b. ʿImrān⌝ and the troops with him went out and advanced in battle lines against the Qarmaṭians. He ordered the inhabitants of al-Kūfah to be on guard, lest the Qarmaṭians find them unprepared and enter the city. On the Day of Slaughtering, the battle between them was fought uninterruptedly until the time of the afternoon prayer. Then the Qarmaṭians were routed and fled toward al-Qādisiyyah.

The inhabitants of al-Kūfah repaired their wall and moat and joined the men of the central authorities in guarding the city night and day. Isḥāq b. ʿImrān wrote to the central authorities asking for reinforcements. A number of the officers of the central authorities were mobilized to go out to them , / / among them: [2262]
Ṭāhir b. ʿAlī b. Wazīr,[785] Waṣīf b. Ṣawārtakīn al-Turkī,[786] al-Faḍl b. Mūsā b. Bughā,[787] the eunuch Bishr al-Afshīnī,[788] Jinnī

---

[782] For ālah "outfit," which includes banners, insignia, etc., see Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, trans. Rosenthal, II, 48ff.

[783] Presumably, the entrance to the Jabbānat Kindah section of al-Kūfah.

[784] The meaning of str "parapets" (?) in this context is quite uncertain.

[785] Ṭāhir was entrusted with presenting the insignia of office to the Sāmānid Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl after his father's death (see text below, 2279). In 296, he became involved in the affair of Ibn al-Muʿtazz. See ʿArīb, 29.

[786] Ibn Ṣawārtakīn was also involved in the affair of Ibn al-Muʿtazz. See ʿArīb, 26; Eclipse, I, 7. It is not known whether he was killed on that occurrence, but I know of no later reference to him.

[787] For al-Faḍl b. Mūsā, see text above, III, 1930, 1956.

[788] Bishr (R: "Yusr") al-Afshīnī is identical with Bishr, the mawlā of Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj (whose nickname was Afshīn), although the two have received separate entries in the index of the Leiden edition. The identity is confirmed by the text below, 2268, where the bestowal of a robe of honor upon Bishr al-Afshīnī makes sense only if he was Bishr, the mawlā of Ibn Abī al-Sāj, who had a leading role in the event described there. He is also no doubt identical with Bishr the governor of Ṭarsūs in 302 (see text below, 2291, 2293), who appears in Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 15, al-Ṣafwānī,[789] and Rā'iq al-Khazarī.[790] A number of the chamber pages and others were attached to them. On Tuesday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 15, 293 (Tuesday, October 7, 906), the first of them left. There was no commander-in-chief; each one of them commanded his own men. Al-Qāsim b. Sīmā and other Arab tribesmen from the desert areas in Diyār Muḍar,[791] the Euphrates Road, Daqūqā', Khānījār, and other regions gathered to rise up and march against the Qarmaṭians, since the men of the central authorities were dispersed in the Syrian region and Egypt. Messengers[792] went with this order to the Arab tribesmen, and they came.

Following this, word arrived at Baghdad ⌜this year⌝ that those who had gone to the relief of Isḥāq ⌜b. ʿImrān⌝ had left him and his men behind in al-Kūfah to secure the city and had gone out with their men against Zikrawayh. They went to a place four mīl (eight km) from al-Qādisiyyah known as al-Ṣaw'ar in the desert along the line (of al-Kūfah). Zikrawayh met them there, and they moved in battle lines against[793] him on Monday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 21, 293 (Monday, October 13, 906). ⌜According to another report, the battle took place on Sunday, Dhū al-Ḥijjah 20.⌝ The government forces left a distance of about a mīl (two km) between themselves and their train, leaving no fighting men behind with the train. The battle between them grew fierce. At the begining of [2263] the day, it went against / / the Qarmaṭian and his men, and they were almost overcome. However, unbeknownst to the (government forces), Zikrawayh had set up an ambush[794] behind them. At midday, (the forces from) the ambush moved against the train and looted it. When the government forces saw the sword in their rear, they fled most ignominiously. The Qarmaṭian and his men as ʿfsn (!) al-Afshīnī. He may also be identical with Bishr al-Khādim who was appointed governor of Damascus and Aleppo by al-Qāhir in 321 (933) and who was killed, it seems, in the same year by the Ikhshīdid Muḥammad b. Ṭughj. See Ibn al-ʿAdīm, Zubdat al-ḥalab, I, 97.

---

[789] Jinnī al-Ṣafwānī was entrusted with the security of Diyār Muḍar in 305 (917), (see above, n. 636). He was captured by the Qarmaṭians in 312 (925) (ʿArib, 124; Eclipse, I, 145), and there is no mention of him thereafter. See also above, n. 360.

[790] See text below, 2265, but there does not seem to be further information about him. An identity with contemporary namesakes cannot be securely established.

[791] RB: "Diyār Rabīʿah."

[792] Text: al-rasā'il "messages"; RC: al-rusul "messengers."

[793] R: fa-ṣādafūhu "they encountered him."

[794] See above, n. 666.

put the government forces to the sword ⌜killing them⌝ as they wished. A number of Khazar and other chamber pages, about one hundred strong, remained steadfast and fought to the death, inflicting great losses upon the Qarmaṭians. The Qarmaṭians rounded up and took possession of the train of the government forces. The only men to escape were those who were saved by the excellence of their mounts or who were gravely wounded and hid among the dead and then walked with difficulty to al-Kūfah after the end of the battle. The swift camels in the train which had been sent by the central authorities along with their men, and which carried weapons and the outfit, were seized; there were about three hundred swift camels as well as five hundred mules, which were also seized. The government forces who were killed in the battle amounted to one thousand five hundred men, not counting pages, camel drivers,[795] and those in the train. The booty made in the battle by the Qarmaṭian and his men added to their strength. He broke into stores of provisions beside (the train?) and took food and barley and had it all carried to his camp on the mules of the government (forces). He then traveled from the location of the battle about five mīl (ten km) along the line to a place near the one known as Nahr al-Mathniyyah.[796] This was because the stench of the dead bothered them.

The source of the following report is Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. al-Jarrāḥ: / / The Arab tribesmen to whom Zikrawayh had sent [2264] messages reached the gate of al-Kūfah, just as the Muslims had returned from their place of prayer together with Isḥāq b. ʿImrān. They dispersed in two directions and entered the houses of al-Kūfah. Earlier, they had set up a tent for al-Qāsim b. Aḥmad, the dāʿī of Zikrawayh, saying, "This[797] is the son of the Messenger of God." They shouted, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn!" meaning al-Ḥusayn b. Zikrawayh, whose corpse was hung at the gate of the bridge in Madīnat al-Salām. Their battle cry was, "O Aḥmad, O Muḥammad!" meaning the two sons of Zikrawayh who had been killed.[798] They displayed white banners, and they thought they might [795] Text: "porters"; read wa-al-jammālīn as in RB.

[796] The form of the name and the location are unknown.
[797] Referring to Zikrawayh as represented by the tent?
[798] That is, Yaḥyā (Muḥammad) and al-Ḥusayn (Aḥmad), here referred to by the names they claimed for themselves. See text above, III, 2218, 2220.

seduce the Kūfan mob with those words they used.[799] Isḥāq b. ʿImrān and the men of his who were with him speedily moved against them, repelling them and killing those who stood their ground. Some ⌜members of the family of Abū Ṭālib⌝[800] were there ⌜and fought alongside Isḥāq b. ʿImrān, as did some⌝ ordinary people.

The Qarmaṭians withdrew humbled,[801] and on the same day went to a village called al-ʿUshayrah[802] at the outer reaches of the administrative district of al-Sāliḥīn[803] and Nahr Yūsuf adjacent to the desert. They dispatched to the enemy of God, Zikrawayh ⌜b. Mihrawayh⌝, some people to bring him out of a hole in the ground in which he had been hiding for many years in the village of al-Darriyyah.[804] The inhabitants of the village of al-Ṣaw'ar [2265] made him spit upon / / their hands,[805] calling him the friend of God, and upon seeing him, they prostrated themselves before him. A number of his *dāʿī*s and intimates were also present. He told them that their greatest benefactor was al-Qāsim b. Aḥmad who had brought them back to the (true) religion after they had left it; if they would obey his command, he would fulfill the promises made to them and have them attain their hopes. He invented myths for them in which he mentioned verses of the Qur'ān, giving them an interpretation different from the one intended in the revelation. All the Arab tribesmen, *mawlā*s, Nabataeans,[806] and others in whose hearts the love of unbelief was firmly planted, acknowledged that Zikrawayh was their foremost chief, their cave, and their refuge. They were certain of

---

[799] R: alladhī aẓharū, confirmed by C and Miskawayh.

[800] The ʿAlid component was always strong in the Kūfan population, and having at least partial support from them in this situation was particularly important for the government.

[801] The word used here (khāsiʿīn) recalls Qur. 2:65, 7:166, where it refers to monkeys.

[802] The vocalization is uncertain and based upon a different Dhāt al-ʿUshayrah which occurs in the history of the Prophet. Halm, "Söhne Zikrawaihs," 52, reads al-ʿAshīrah.

[803] Al-Sāliḥīn or al-Saylaḥīn, listed under al-Saylaḥūn in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 218f., where it is described as being located near al-Qādisiyyah. It is mentioned together with Nahr Yūsuf in the text above, II, 725.

[804] The form and vocalization are uncertain. Perhaps, it is to be identified with Durubbā listed by Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 561.

[805] See the note in the Leiden edition and Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CL. Readings such as yutlifūna "spoiled him by their behavior" or the like, as in the Cairo edition, seem less likely.

[806] That is, the native sedentary rural population.

victory and the attainment of their hopes. When Zikrawayh traveled with them, he was not accessible to them; they called him lord and did not let him go out to those in their camp. Al-Qāsim, not he, was actually in charge and executed matters according to his[807] views over an area extending to the outer reaches of the administrative region of al-Kūfah which is irrigated by the Euphrates. He let them know that all the people of the Sawād were coming out to join him. He remained there some twenty days, during which time he sent out messengers of his in disguise[808] among the Sawādīs. However, none of them joined him,[809] except those who suffered hard times. They were about five hundred men with their women and children.

⌜The central authorities sent parties of soldiers against him⌝ and issued written orders to all those whom it had dispatched to al-Anbār and Hīt to secure (those cities); for it was feared that those Qarmaṭians who had remained at the two watering places might return there upon departing for al-Kūfah. The central authorities therefore rushed a number of officers against him,[810] among them: Bishr[811] al-Afshīnī, Jinnī al-Ṣafwānī, Niḥrīr al-ʿUmarī,[812] and Rā'iq, the ranking knight[813] of the Commander of the Faithful, as well as the young pages known as the chamber pages. They attacked the enemies of God // near the village of [2266] al-Ṣaw'ar killing their foot soldiers[814] and a number of their horsemen. The Qarmaṭians let their tents fall into their hands. They entered them and busied themselves with them, whereupon the Qarmaṭians turned upon them and routed them.

The source of the following report is someone who ⌜mentioned that he⌝ was present in the office of Muḥammad b. Dāwūd ⌜b. al-Jarrāḥ⌝, when some Qarmaṭians, among them the brother-

---

807 Of Zikrawayh or of al-Qāsim?

808 Text: mustalḥiqīn "asking them to join"; read mustakhfīn as in R. There seems to be no manuscript authority for the reading of the Leiden edition.

809 Text: "them"; read bihī "him" as in R.

810 Text: "against them"; read ilayhi "against him" as in RC and Miskawayh.

811 R and Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 50, read again "Yusr."

812 Niḥrīr al-ʿUmarī (al-ʿAmrī ?) disappears from history with his capture by the Qarmaṭian Abū Ṭāhir, the son of Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī, on Friday, al-Muḥarram 22, 312 (Friday, April 30, 924). See Eclipse, I, 121; Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 57.

813 This may be the meaning of fatā here, rather than "slave."

814 RC: rijālahum "their men." This might be the more original text.

in-law [815] of Zikrawayh, were brought in to him. The brother-in-law told him as follows: Zikrawayh was in hiding at my residence, in a cellar of my house protected by an iron door. We had a movable furnace, and whenever a search party came to us, we placed the furnace on the cellar door, and a woman got up to heat it. Zikrawayh remained in this situation for four years. That was in the days of al-Muʿtaḍid. ⌜He used to say, "I shall not go out as long as al-Muʿtaḍid is among the living."⌝ He was then moved from my residence to a house which had a room built in behind its door. When the door of the house was opened, it would cover the door of the room; thus, a person entering would not notice the door of the room in which Zikrawayh was. This remained the situation until al-Muʿtaḍid died. He then dispatched dāʿīs and worked toward coming out to rebel.

When the report—I mean, the report of the battle between the Qarmaṭian and the government forces at al-Ṣaw'ar—reached the central authorities in Baghdad, people considered it an important event. The officers mentioned by me were mobilized to go out to al-Kūfah, and Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Kundājīq was made commander-in-chief. He was followed next by ʿAllān b. Muḥammad b. Kushmard[816] with a large army. Waṣīf b. Sawārtakīn[817] had preceded them earlier with a substantial force. A number of Arab tribesmen from the Banū Shaybān and the Namir, about two thousand men, were attached to (Ibn Kundājīq) and given their allotments.

[2267] On Jumādā I 18, 293 (March 17, 906), / / a group of about ten persons arrived in Baghdad from Mecca. They went to the Caliph's court and asked that troops be sent to their land, because they were afraid that the rebel in the Yemen[818] might invade it, as they thought that he was already nearby.

---

[815] The silf "brother of the sister of the wife" of Zikrawayh (see text above, III, 2127) may be identical with al-Muntaqim, although al-Muntaqim is described as the brother of Zikrawayh's wife. See below, n. 889.

[816] There is no reason to doubt the parentage of ʿAllān as indicated here. It would seem to make him a brother of Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Kushmard (see above, nn. 398 and 657). For the unhappy role ʿAllān played in the following year, see text below, 2270f. One of ʿAllān's pages is mentioned in ʿArīb, 68, l. 3, sub anno 305 (917-8).

[817] The spelling with S, instead of Ṣ, occurs also elsewhere in the Ṭabarī manuscripts.

[818] See above, n. 751, and van Arendonk, Opkomst, 219, n. 3.

On Friday, Rajab 12, 293 (Friday, May 9, 906), a dispatch which had reached the central authorities was read from the pulpit in Baghdad. It said that the inhabitants of Ṣanʿā' and other cities in the Yemen had gathered against the rebel who had seized power in their country. They fought and routed him, and his troops fled, whereupon he had withdrawn to some place in the Yemen.

On Shawwāl 3, 293 (July 28, 906), the Caliph bestowed a robe of honor upon Muẓaffar b. Ḥājj and formally appointed him governor of the Yemen. Ibn Ḥājj left on Dhū al-Qaʿdah 5, 293 (August 28, 906), and went to his administrative post in the Yemen, staying there until he died.[819]

On ⌜Rajab⌝ 23, 293 (May 20, 906), al-Muktafī's tent was taken out ⌜and set up⌝ at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah in expectation of his departure for Syria on account of Ibn al-Khalīj. But then, on Rajab 24, 293 (May 21, 906), a mail pouch ⌜from Egypt⌝ arrived at Baghdad with a report from Fātik. It indicated that he and the officers had advanced against al-Khalījī and that many battles had taken place between them. In the last battle, most of al-Khalījī's men had been killed, and the rest then fled. They had overcome them and had taken over their camp. Al-Khalījī had fled, and eventually entered al-Fusṭāṭ where he hid in the house of a local man. The allies then entered al-Fusṭāṭ, and when they had established themselves there, Fātik was shown where al-Khalījī was and those of his partisans who were hiding with him. He had them arrested and detained on behalf of (al-Muktafī?). Al-Muktafī wrote to[820] // Fātik ordering him to bring al-Khalījī and those [2268] who were seized[821] with him to Madīnāt al-Salām.

Al-Muktafī's tents which had been taken out to Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah were brought back, and he sent word to return his stores which had already passed Takrīt, which was done. Fātik then sent al-Khalījī and a number of the men captured with him from Egypt to Madīnat al-Salām with Bishr,[822] the mawlā of [819] See above, n. 401. For doubts about the chronology offered here, see van Arendonk, Opkomst, 182, n. 2.

[820] R indicates the passive "Fātik received written orders."
[821] R: "and those partisans of his who had been hiding."
[822] See above, n. 788.

Muḥammad b. Abī al-Sāj. On Thursday, Ramaḍān 15, 293 (Thursday, July 10, 906), al-Khalījī was brought into Madīnat al-Salām by way of Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah. In front of him, there were twenty-one[823] men upon camels, wearing hoods and silken cloaks, among them, reportedly, the two sons of Bīnak,[824] Abū Shikāl,[825] who had come to the camp of the central authorities from the camp of ʿAmr b. al-Layth al-Ṣaffār to ask for a guarantee of safe-conduct, and the black eunuch Ṣandal al-Muzāḥimī.[826] *Ibn al-Khalījī[827] was carried on a camel, hanging on a stake which had been placed on it. Behind the back of his head, there was an artificial hand (mithāl kaff). When the camel moved with him, the hand struck the back of his head.*[828] When al-Khalījī came to al-Muktafī, the Caliph looked him over and ordered that he be detained in the palace, while the others were to be incarcerated in the New Prison. He sent them to Ibn ʿAmrawayh[829] who was in charge of the police in Baghdad. He then bestowed robes of honor upon his wazīr al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan for his skillful handling of matters leading to this victory. He also bestowed a robe of honor upon Bishr al-Afshīnī.[830]

In this year, al-Muktafī married the daughter of Khumārawayh b. Aḥmad b. Ṭūlūn.[831] They were married by Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad b. Yūsuf.

---

[823] Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 236, ed. Pellat, V, 187: "twenty-four."

[824] The form of the name is uncertain. Bīnak seems to be the above-mentioned man who was killed in 264 (877). See text above, III, 1924. There does not seem to be any further record of his sons.

[825] The form of the name is uncertain, and no further information seems to be available about him.

[826] Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 100, mentions him sub anno 283 (896) as a mawlā of Muzāḥim b. Khāqān. Muzāḥim was a brother of Aḥmad b. Khāqān and a governor of Egypt. He died there on Monday, al-Muḥarram 5, 254 (Monday, January 5, 868) (Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, II, 338f.); in the text above, III, 1693, his death is dated in Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 253 (December 867).

[827] In this passage, R uses Ibn al-Khalījī throughout.

[828] For al-Khalījī's transportation to Baghdad, see Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 154.

[829] For Muḥammad b. ʿAmrawayh, see ʿArīb, 21, 23, 30; Eclipse, I, 4, 7, 14. According to Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 174, he died in Āmid in 298 (910-11).

[830] See above, n. 788.

[831] Apparently, a half-sister of Qaṭr al-Nadā whom al-Muʿtaḍid married instead of his son, the future al-Muktafī, see text above, III, 2134. She seems to have been among the members of the Ṭūlūnid family transferred to Baghdad. There may have been some political motive for the marriage, anticipating developments which, as it turned out, failed to materialize.

On Shawwāl 5, 293 (July 30, 906), the head of the Qarmaṭian named Naṣr, the one who had looted Hīt, was brought to Baghdad on top of a lance.[832]

On Shawwāl 7, 293 (August 1, 906), word arrived at Madīnat al-Salām that the Byzantines had raided Qūrus.[833] Its inhabitants fought them, but the Byzantines routed and killed most of them as well as the chieftains of the Banū Tamīm. They entered the city, burned down its mosque, and drove away the remaining inhabitants. // [2269]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik ⌜al-Hāshimī.⌝

[832] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 51, adds, no doubt following some Ṭabarī recension: "It was carried around on both sides of Baghdad." For the episode, see Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 374, who indicates the correct day of the week (Wednesday).

[833] That is, Cyrrhus, approximately sixty km northwest of Aleppo. See Canard, Sources arabes, 19; Pauly-Wissowa, s. v. Kyrros; Der Kleine Pauly, s. v. Kyrrhos. See the location indicated on the map between pp. 240 and 241 in Canard, Ḥamdanides. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 199, describes the town as containing impressive ancient ruins.

The ⌜Important⌝ Events of the Year

294

(OCTOBER 22, 906 - OCTOBER 11, 907)

One of the events was the arrival of Ibn Kayghalagh[834] in Ṭarsūs in order to undertake a raid. He arrived on al-Muḥarram⌜1,⌝ 294 (October 22, 906). Rustum went on the raid with him; it was Rustum's second. They went as far as Salandū, where God gave them victory, and then reached Ālis.[835] About five thousand persons fell into their hands. They killed a great number of Byzantines and then returned safely.

On al-Muḥarram 12,[836] 294 (November 2, 906), word reached Madīnat al-Salām that the Qarmaṭian Zikrawayh b. Mihrawayh had left the place known as Nahr al-Mathniyyah with the intention of attacking the pilgrims and that he had reached a place four mīl (eight km) from Wāqiṣah.[837]

---

[834] That is, Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh. Note the slightly different account of this episode in the text below, 2275f.

[835] Apparently, the Halys/Alys river, the present Kızıl Irmak. See Canard, Sources arabes, 20. In the text above, III, 1237 (also 1351), al-Lms is explained as the river of Seleucia (the ancient Kalykadnos in Cilicia and the present Gök-su), located at about a day's distance from Ṭarsūs and the place of ransom negotiations; but see above, n. 174. One manuscript consistently reads 'lls, and this caused Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 64, to quote Ṭabarī's identification, s. v. Ālis. Whatever locality may be meant on the first occurrence in the text above, III, 1237, it has been assumed, on the following pages, to represent the Halys. See Vasiliev, I, 146, n. 4, and Marin's translation, 62, n. 316.

[836] ʿArīb, 14, l. 6: "al-Muḥarram 11."

[837] The pilgrim stations on the Mecca Road, also referred to as "the Highway," existed for the purpose of providing fodder and water for the pilgrim caravans. Many of those stations were also protected by fortresses, as described in the text above, III, 486, and in the narrative here. All this was necessary and required great expenditures that were born by the government, but, as can be seen here clearly, the "Road" remained always highly vulnerable.

The names of the desert stations often reflect certain features of the desert terrain. The places were important in the lives of large numbers of Muslims. Thus their names were familiar, and most of them are listed in the geographical literature. However, some minor localities, not situated directly on the Mecca Road but mentioned by Ṭabarī in his report, are not easily identifiable. The section of the Mecca

According to the report of Muḥammad b. Dāwūd, the Qarmaṭians went westward[838] in the desert and eventually reached a watering place called Salmān.[839] The region between them and the Sawād was a waterless desert. The Qarmaṭian stayed where he was with the intention of attacking the pilgrims and waited for the first caravan. It reached Wāqiṣah on al-Muḥarram 6 or 7, 294 (October 27 or 28, 906). The local people warned the pilgrims, informing them that they were four mīl from the Qarmaṭians. So they did not stay but moved on and were saved. Al-Ḥasan b. Mūsā al-Rabaʿī[840] and Sīmā al-Ibrāhīmī[841] were in this caravan. When the caravan persisted in traveling on, the Qarmaṭian went to Wāqiṣah and asked the people there about it. When they informed him that the caravan had not stayed there, he suspected them of having warned it and therefore killed / / a number of the [2270] fodder-sellers there and burned the fodder, while the inhabitants fortified themselves in their fortress. He stayed there several days and then left for Zubālah.

According to the report of Muḥammad b. Dāwūd, the troops went toward the Springs of al-Ṭaff[842] in pursuit of Zikrawayh, but then departed from there when they learned that he was in Salmān. ʿAllān b. Kushmard went after Zikrawayh with a special detachment of cavalry by way of the Mecca Highway. They encamped at al-Sibāl,[843] and ʿAllān then marched toward Wāqiṣah and encamped there after the first caravan had passed through.

Road dealt with here is located approximately 28°-30° N, 44°-45° E, roughly one-third the distance between al-Kūfah/al-Baṣrah and Mecca. Map B in Thilo, Ortsnamen, for instance, shows Qarʿā', Wāqiṣah, Salmān, al-ʿAqabah, Zubālah, Thaʿlabiyyah, and Fayd. On a 1958 map, scale 1:2,000,000, published by the Department of the Interior, U. S. Geological Survey, we find Birkat al-ʿAqabah and Zubālah still lişted. According to various entries in Yāqūt's Muʿjam, the stations between al-Kūfah and Wāqiṣah were al-Mughīthiyyah, al-Zubaydiyyah, and al-Qarʿā'. Counting up the individual distances indicated, the distance between al-Qādisiyyah and Wāqiṣah was eighty mīl (160 km). See the map showing the pilgrim routes of Arabia on p. 22 of W. C. Brice (ed.), An Historical Atlas of Islam (Leiden 1981). On the Mecca Road, see also EI², Suppl., s. v. Darb Zubayda, and the unpublished doctoral dissertation by S. ʿA. ʿA. al-Rashīd mentioned in EI², Suppl., s.v. Fayd.

838 Lit., from an eastern direction.

839 See above, n. 837, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 121f.

840 R: "b. ʿAlī." No further information is available for him.

841 He is hardly identical with Sīmā al-Khazarī mentioned in Eclipse, I, 46.

842 See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 539ff. It seems that the troops originally went north when they should have gone south.

843 Both the form and the location of this place are uncertain.

On the way, Zikrawayh passed groups of the Banū Asad. He took them and[844] their tents along with him on his move toward the Highway and against the pilgrims returning from Mecca.

On al-Muḥarram 16, 294 (November 6, 906), the pigeon post from al-Kūfah brought the news to Baghdad that on Sunday, al-Muḥarram 11, 294 (Saturday, November 1, 906), Zikrawayh had attacked the caravan of the Khurāsānians at al-ʿAqabah[845] on the Mecca Road, and that they had fought him energetically. He had interrogated them asking whether government men were among them. When they denied it and said that they were (simply) pilgrims, he told them that he did not want them and they should go. When the caravan went on its way, he followed and then attacked it. His men started to prick the camels with lances and rip them with swords, so that they broke lose and the caravan got confused. They fell upon the pilgrims and killed them at will. They killed men and women, took captive the [2271] women they wanted, and seized for themselves what / / there was in the caravan.

One of the pilgrims who escaped encountered ʿAllān b. Kushmard who asked him what had happened, and he told him what had befallen the Khurāsānian caravan. The pilgrim then said: "There is only a short distance between you and the people.[846] Tonight or tomorrow, the second caravan will arrive. When they see a banner of the central authorities, they will take heart. In God's name, show concern for them!" But ʿAllān immediately turned back and ordered those with him to do likewise, saying, "I will not expose the government forces to being killed."

Zikrawayh then came up, and the second caravan arrived. Using a number of messengers who avoided the Highway, the central authorities had informed the leaders of the second and third caravans, and the officers and civilian officials in them, by letter about what the wicked man was doing to the pilgrims. They ordered them to be on guard against him and to go toward Wāsiṭ and al-Baṣrah instead of following the Highway, or to [844] Text: min "from"; Mss. bi-(buyūtihā). The correction in the Leiden text seems unnecessary.

---

[845] See above, n. 837, and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 692, l. 6.

[846] R: baynahū "between him (the Qarmaṭian)." This suggests that "the people" may be the Qarmaṭians rather than the troops and pilgrims in the caravan.

return to Fayd[847] or al-Madīnah and wait for the troops to join them. The messages had reached them, but they did not listen and did not stay and wait.

The people in the second caravan pressed on. It included al-Mubārak al-Qummī, Aḥmad b. Naṣr al-ʿUqaylī, and Aḥmad b. ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn al-Hamadhānī.[848] The criminals had come to Wāqiṣah, and before leaving, they had made the watering places there unusable, filling the ponds and wells with the corpses of camels and horses whose bellies were split open. Now they came to the ʿAqabah station on Monday, al-Muḥarram 12, 294 (Sunday, November 2, 906). The men in the second caravan fought them. Abū al-ʿAshā'ir[849] was at the head of the caravan with his men, while Mubārak al-Qummī was in the rear with his. The fighting was fierce. Eventually, they routed the criminals, and they were about // to overcome them when the criminals found the rear [2272] unawares and fell upon them from that direction. They thrust their lances into the sides and bellies of the camels which (fell upon the fighters in the caravan and) crushed them. They thus overpowered them and put them to the sword, killing them to the last man, except those whom they made slaves. They then dispatched horsemen several mīl beyond al-ʿAqabah where they encountered those who had escaped the slaughter. They granted them guarantees of safe-conduct, but then returned and killed all of them. They took captive the women they liked and seized all the money and goods. Al-Mubārak al-Qummī and his son Muẓaffar[850] were killed, and Abū al-ʿAshā'ir was captured. The corpses were collected and stacked, forming a large hill. Abū al-ʿAshā'ir's hands and feet were then cut off, and he was decapitated. The women they did not want were released. Some of the wounded had fallen among those killed. During the night, they dragged themselves away; some of them died, a few were saved. The Qarmaṭian women always went around among those killed [847] A major station on the Mecca Road, Fayd was used by pilgrims to leave provisions and things to be picked up on their return journey. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 927, and EI², Suppl., s. v. Fayd.

---

[848] I have not succeeded in finding further information about him.

[849] That is, Aḥmad b. Naṣr al-ʿUqaylī.

[850] Al-Muẓaffar b. al-Mubārak al-Qummī appears in connection with the wazīr al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan in Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 188.

with their children who offered them water. Those who talked to them (indicating that they were still alive), they[851] finished off.

Reportedly about twenty-thousand ⌜pilgrims⌝ were in the caravan. All of them were killed, except a small number. These included those who prevailed over the enemy ⌜and were thus saved, although left⌝ without provisions, the wounded who had fallen among those killed and later escaped, and those whom the Qarmaṭians made slaves to serve them. The money and splendid goods seized by the Qarmaṭians in this caravan were reportedly worth two million dīnārs.

One of the craftsmen working in precious metals[852] is the source for the report that letters from the Egyptian workers in precious metals had reached them saying, "You will become rich this year. The family of Ibn Ṭūlūn, the Egyptian officers who had [2273] been sent / / to Madīnat al-Salām, and people of similar standing have shipped their Egyptian property to Madīnat al-Salām. They have had gold and silver vessels and jewelry melted down into ingots." The ingots were taken to Mecca to be carried with the pilgrims to Madīnat al-Salām. All of it was lost, and nothing was recovered.

While the Qarmaṭians were killing and looting this caravan on Monday (Sunday, November 2, 906), the caravan of the Khurāsānians reportedly approached. A number of Qarmaṭians went out against them and attacked them. They suffered the same fate.

When Zikrawayah had finished with the people of the second pilgrim caravan, seizing their possessions and allowing their women to be taken as legal booty, he filled the pools and wells at al-ʿAqabah with the corpses of people and horses and left immediately.

The news of his assault on ⌜the second of⌝ the caravans of the central authorities reached Madīnat al-Salām on Friday evening, al-Muḥarram 16, 294 (Thursday, November 6, 906), and greatly disturbed the central authorities and everybody else. The wazīr al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan b. Ayyūb mobilized Muḥammad ⌜b. Dāwūd⌝ b. al-Jarrāḥ, the secretary in charge of the Offices[853] of the Land [851] Referring, it seems, to the Qarmaṭian men, and not to the women and children.

[852] Ḍarrāb usually indicates coiner but here it has probably a more general meaning, referring to gold and silver workers for whom the influx of the ingots promised more work. The reporter was no doubt a ḍarrāb living in Baghdad.
[853] R has the singular.

Tax and the Estates in the East as well as the Office of the Army, to go to al-Kūfah and stay there, in order to dispatch troops against the Qarmaṭians. Ibn al-Jarrāḥ left Baghdad on al-Muḥarram 19, 294 (November 9, 906), carrying with him much money with which to pay the troops.

Zikrawayh then traveled to Zubālah. He encamped there and deployed vanguards and rearguards, because he was afraid that the government forces stationed in al-Qādisiyyah would make contact with him and also because he was expecting the arrival of the third caravan which included the money and the merchants. He then traveled to al-Thaʿlabiyyah, and then to al-Shuqūq.[854] He stayed between al-Shuqūq and al-Biṭān[855] ⌜at the edge of the sand dunes⌝ in / / a place known as al-Ṭulayḥ,[856] waiting for the third [2274] caravan. It included the officers Nafīs al-Muwalladī and Ṣāliḥ al-Aswad.[857] (Ṣāliḥ) had with him the umbrella that al-Muʿtadid had adorned with precious jewels,[858] and the (caravan) chest. Also included in the caravan were: Ibrāhīm b. Abī al-Ashʿath,[859] who was chief judge of Mecca ⌜and al-Madīnah and who was also responsible for the Mecca Road⌝ and the expenditures for its upkeep, Maymūn b. Ibrāhīm al-Kātib[860] who was in charge of the affairs of the Office of Land Tax Bookkeeping and the Estates, Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. Aḥmad, who was known as Ibn al-Hazallaj,[861] al-Furāt b. Aḥmad b. Muḥammad b. al-Furāt,[862] al-Ḥasan b. Ismāʿīl,[863] a relative of al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan, who

---

[854] According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 309, al-Shuqūq was located after Wāqiṣah on the Mecca Road.

[855] According to Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 661, (al-)Biṭān was located after al-Shuqūq and before al-Thaʿlabiyyah.

[856] Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 375, l. 11, refers to this place as al-Ṭlyḥ belonging to al-Habīr (below, n. 865). Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, VII, 379, and Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 60, ll. 4f., omit the name and refer only to al-Habīr. ʿArīb has al-Khlyj, apparently an error.

[857] For Nafīs, see above, n. 399. Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 375, l. 12, mentions Nafīs and Aḥmad b. Sīmā in this context. I have no further information about Ṣāliḥ al-Aswad.

[858] Rather than "jewel" in the singular. For further references to the umbrella as symbolizing the presence of royal authority, see text above, III, 1555, and Introductio etc., CCCXVI.

[859] I have no further information about him.

[860] Abū al-Qāsim Maymūn b. Ibrāhīm al-Mādharā'ī is mentioned in Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 203, 250, as head of the Dīwān al-zimām. See Sourdel, Vizirat, 338.

[861] See Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 184.

[862] I have no record of him. On his father, see above, n. 415.

[863] His relationship to the wazīr cannot be ascertained.

was postmaster of the two holy cities, and ʿAli b. al-ʿAbbās al-Nahīkī.[864]

When the people in this caravan reached Fayd, they learned about the evil Zikrawayh and his men. They stayed in Fayd several days and waited for reinforcements to come to them from the central authorities, as Ibn Kushmard had returned from the Road to al-Qādisiyyah with the troops which the central authorities had dispatched with him as well as in advance of him and afterwards. When the caravan came into contact with the accursed one in a place called al-Habīr,[865] which was on al-Muḥarram 21, 294 (November 11, 906), he confronted them. They fought him all that day until nightfall, and then he withdrew from them. In the morning, he came once more to engage them in combat, and they fought each other. On the third day, the people of the caravan in al-Habīr who were without water became thirsty and, after fighting, surrendered. He put them to the sword; only a few of them escaped. The Qarmaṭians seized the women and everything in the caravan.

In this year, the central authorities dispatched two thousand and two hundred horsemen of the Banū Shaybān to fight the Qarmaṭians.

In this year, Zikrawayh went to Fayd where the representative [2275] of the central authorities was a man called / / Ḥāmid b. Fīrūz.[866] Ḥāmid, together with about a hundred men who were with him in the mosque,[867] sought refuge from Zikrawayh in one of Fayd's two fortresses, and he garrisoned the other fortress. Zikrawayh now began to correspond with the inhabitants of Fayd asking them to surrender their official (Ḥāmid) and the troops among them.[868] The inhabitants of Fayd, however, did not respond to his

---

[864] Al-Nahīkī (not al-Nuhaykī) appears to be identical with the official mentioned by Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 87, where he appears as the person in charge of the important land tax district of Bādūrayā.

[865] A similar occurrence at al-Habīr in the year 312 (924) is mentioned by ʿArīb, 118f.; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 951.

The addition in R fills the lacuna correctly assumed in the Leiden edition. It agrees fully with what is found in Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 160.

[866] I have not succeeded in obtaining further information about him.

[867] This appears to imply that the Qarmaṭians made their move when the people were at prayer in the mosque.

[868] Read fihim as in R and other sources.

request, and he fought them without result. ⌜He continued:⌝[869] When he saw that he could not do anything with them, he withdrew to al-Nibāj[870] and then went to Ḥufayr Abī Mūsā al-Ashʿarī.[871]

On Rabīʿ I 1, 294 (December 20, 906), al-Muktafī mobilized Waṣīf b. Ṣawārtakīn with a number of officers. They left al-Qādisiyyah by the Khaffān Road.[872] On Saturday, Rabīʿ I 22, 294 (Saturday, January 10, 907), Waṣīf encountered Zikrawayh. They fought all day long, then night intervened between them. They spent the night on guard against each other. He then returned to attack them. The government troops caused a great slaughter among the Qarmaṭians. They got to the enemy of God, Zikrawayh, and when he turned his back, one of the soldiers struck the back of his head with a sword in such a way that it went through his brain. Zikrawayh, his lieutenant,[873] and a number of his intimates and relatives, among them his son,[874] his secretary, and his wife were taken captive, and the troops took possession of everything in his camp. Zikrawayh lived five more days and then died. His belly was split open, and emptied of its contents. He was carried away as he was and taken to Madīnat al-Salām. He was carried upon a camel. The hood had been placed on his head, and he was dressed in a brocade cloak. In front of him was his wife Mu'minah,[875] wearing a silken dress and wrap. Also paraded before him were the umbrella which he had seized and from which he had removed the jewels, and the captives. ⌜The captured pilgrims who had remained alive while they were in his hands were returned⌝[876]

---

[869] Presumably, Ibn al-Jarrāḥ.

[870] See text above, I, 1914; Thilo, Ortsnamen, 76f., map. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 736f., does not seem to be quite certain about the location of al-Nibāj; he assumes it to be near Fayd halfway between al-Baṣrah and Mecca.

[871] R and Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 60, l. 10: "Ḥafar." See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 294, who supports this reading. On the famous early Muslim Abū Mūsā al-ʿAshʿarī, see EI², s. v. al-Ashʿarī, Abū Mūsā.

[872] Khaffān was located near al-Kūfah. The road passing by it was occasionally used by the Mecca pilgrims. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 456.

[873] It seems that this lieutenant cannot be further identified.

[874] It is not clear which of his sons is meant.

[875] This appears to be the correct reading, giving the name of Zikrawayh's wife.

[876] The concluding words to this account in Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 56, were probably taken from the Ṭabarī manuscript used by him: "The Qarmaṭians were then rounded up, and a number of them asked for guarantees of safe-conduct."

In this year, Ibn Kayghalagh undertook a raid from Ṭarsūs. He made four thousand enemy captives and seized many horses and [2276] cattle as well as goods. One of the Patrikioi came // to him to seek a guarantee of safe-conduct and became a Muslim. Ibn Kayghalagh left Ṭarsūs for this raid on al-Muḥarram 1, 294 (October 22, 906).[877]

In this year, the Patrikios Andronikos,[878] who was the Byzantine ruler's military commander of those living in the border regions, wrote to the central authorities in Baghdad seeking a guarantee of safe-conduct. It was granted to him. The Byzantine ruler had sent men to him to arrest him. So he gave weapons to about two hundred Muslims being held captive in his fortress[879] and left, sending them out along with some of his sons. They fell at night upon the Patrikios who had been sent to arrest Andronikos and killed a large number of his men and looted their camp. In Jumādā I, 294 (February 17-March 18, 907), Rustum had left with the people of the border regions to rescue Andronikos and had reached Qūniyah soon after the incident.[880] The Patrikioi learned that the Muslims were marching against them and turned back. Andronikos sent his son to Rustum, while Rustum sent his secretary and a number of sailors[881] (to Andronikos). They spent the night in the fortress. In the morning, Andronikos took out his money and goods and left for the Muslim camp with all the Muslim captives who were with him, those (Muslims) who[882] had come to him,[883] and the ⌜Christians⌝[884] who agreed with [877] See above, n. 834. This paragraph was used by Ibn ʿAsākir in his biography of Aḥmad b. Kayghalagh (see above, n, 677). It seems quite probable that the Patrikios mentioned here was, in fact, the Andronikos mentioned in the following paragraph which may go back to another, better-informed source.

---

[878] See above, n. 722. For the passage, see Canard, Sources arabes, 20f. See also Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 174, which contains information on his son Constantine as well.

[879] Presumably referring to the fortress of Qūniyah (Konya). Canard (see Vasiliev, II, 187) indicates the fortress of Kabala near Konya.

[880] Referring, it seems, to the above-mentioned attack by Andronikos upon the emissary of the Byzantine government.

[881] The reading "sailors" is doubted by Canard but seems to be correct.

[882] The meaning is not quite clear. Perhaps, minhum wa-man should be corrected to mim-man to yield the sense: "and the Christians who agreed with his decision and had joined him."

[883] Text: ilayhim "to them"; RB ilayhi. Canard: "ceux qui étaient allés les retrouver."

[884] For "Christians," R has "those."

his decision. The Muslims laid Qūniyah waste, and then returned to Ṭarsūs together with Andronikos, the Muslim captives, and the Christians who were with Andronikos. / / [2277]

In Jumādā II,[885] 294 (February 17-March 18, 906), a battle took place between the men of al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān and a number of Zikrawayh's men. The latter had fled from the battle in which Zikrawayh suffered the fate he did, and had taken the Euphrates Road intending to go to Syria. A number of them were killed, and a number of their women and children were taken captive.

In this year, emissaries of the Byzantine king, including the maternal uncle of his son Leon and the eunuch Basilios,[886] accompanied by a number of people, arrived at Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah with a letter from the king to al-Muktafī asking him to start ransom negotiations concerning the Muslims held in his territory and the Byzantines held in Muslim territory. Al-Muktafī was asked to send an emissary to Byzantine territory to gather the Muslim captives held there and to reach an agreement (on the ransom conditions) with him. The eunuch Basilios was to remain in Ṭarsūs in order to assemble Byzantine captives from the border regions and convey them, together with the representative of the central authorities,[887] to the place where the ransom negotiations were to be held. The delegation remained in Bāb al-Shammāsiyyah for several days and was then brought into Baghdad. They carried gifts from the Byzantine ruler and brought along ten Muslim captives. The gifts were accepted, and the request of the Byzantine ruler was granted.

In this year, a man who claimed that he was the Sufyānī[888] was seized in Syria. He and a number of people with him were

---

[885] R: "Jumādā I."

[886] The Byzantine Emperor at the time was Leon VI (886-912). Canard, Sources arabes, 21, has no comment on the passage and the identity of the royal personage meant here. No identification of the eunuch is possible.

[887] The reference appears to be to the emissary sent to oversee the ransom negotiations, most likely a ranking member of the judiciary.

[888] The expected mahdī, in this case an individual whose claims centered around pro-Umayyad groups. See EI[2], s. v. Mahdī. R has this entry after the following one.

brought from Syria to the Caliph's court. He was reportedly suffering from delusions.

In this year, the Arab tribesmen on the Mecca Road seized two men, one of whom was known as al-Ḥaddād, and the other as al-Muntaqim.[889] The one known as al-Muntaqim reportedly was [2278] the brother of Zikrawayh's wife. // Both were handed over to Nizār in al-Kūfah, and he sent them on to the Caliph's court in Baghdad. According to the Arab tribesmen, the two had come ⌜to them⌝ to call them to rebel against the central authorities.

⌜In this year, al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān sent a man known as al-Kayyāl[890] together with sixty of his men from the Syrian Road to the central authorities in Baghdad. They belonged to Zikrawayh's men who had come to al-Ḥusayn for guarantees of safe-conduct.⌝

⌜In this year, the Patrikios Andronikos arrived in Baghdad.⌝[891]

In ⌜Ramaḍān, 294 (June 15-July 14, 907),⌝ a battle took place on the Euphrates Road between al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān and the Kalb, Namir, Asad, and other Arab tribesmen who had gathered against him. They routed him and pursued him as far as the gate of Aleppo.

In this year, the Arab Ṭayyi' tribesmen besieged Waṣīf b. Ṣawārtakīn in Fayd. Waṣīf had been sent out as military commander for the pilgrimage season. He was besieged three days and then went out against them. He attacked them, killing some of them. Then they fled, and Waṣīf left ⌜Fayd⌝ with the pilgrims who were with him.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik ⌜al-Hāshimī.⌝

---

[889] That is, "The Avenger." See above, n. 815. Nothing seems to be known about the individual named al-Ḥaddād "The Smith."

[890] There is probably no relationship to the aforementioned Miqdām b. al-Kayyāl (above, n. 754).

[891] Canard, Sources arabes, 21 and 318 (from Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 174).

The Events of the Year 295

(OCTOBER 12, 907 - SEPTEMBER 29, 908)

Among the events of this year was the departure of ʿAbdallāh b. Ibrāhīm al-Mismaʿī[892] from the city of Iṣbahān. He left for a village several *farsakh*s away, with about ten thousand Kurds and others reportedly attached to him in an open show of opposition / / to the central authorities. Badr al-Ḥammāmī was ordered [2279] to move against him, and a number of officers and about five thousand troops were attached to him.

In this year, al-Ḥusayn b. Mūsā[893] made a surprise attack upon the Arab Ṭayyi' ⌜tribesmen⌝ who were fighting Waṣīf b. Ṣawārtakīn. He reportedly killed seventy of their men and took a number of their horsemen captive.

On Ṣafar 14, 295 (November 24, 907), Abū Ibrāhīm Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad, the governor of Khurāsān and Transoxania, died. ⌜His son⌝, Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl ⌜b. Aḥmad⌝,[894] took his father's place as governor and took charge of his official functions. Al-Muktafī reportedly held an audience on Rabīʿ II 4, 295 (January 12, 908), during which he personally tied a standard for him and handed it over to Ṭāhir b. ʿAlī b. Wazīr. He bestowed a robe of honor upon Ṭāhir and ordered him to take the standard to Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl.

---

[892] Al-Mismaʿī d. Saturday, Rabīʿ II 21, 305 (Saturday, October 11, 917). He had a reputation as a ḥadīth scholar. See ʿArīb, 69; Eclipse, index (where he is listed together with his son, below, n. 897). R consistently: "Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh," his son's name.

[893] ʿArīb, 18f., has al-Ḥurr (?) for al-Ḥusayn; R: "al-Ḥasan." No identification with the aforementioned al-Rabaʿī (see above, n. 840) is possible, since it is not known whether al-Rabaʿī survived the disaster in 294.

[894] The Sāmānid Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl was killed in 301 (914). See text below, 2289.

In this year, Manṣūr b. ʿAbdallāh b. Manṣūr al-Kātib[895] was sent out against ʿAbdallāh b. Ibrāhīm al-Mismaʿī. ⌜He wrote to al-Mismaʿī ⌝ in order to frighten him regarding the consequences of opposing (the central authorities) and then marched against him. When he reached him, he had a discussion with him, whereupon al-Mismaʿī again became loyal to the central authorities. Together with Manṣūr b. ʿAbdallāh, al-Mismaʿī left with some of his pages to go to the Caliph's court. He left someone behind in Iṣbahān to carry out his administrative functions. Al-Muktafī became reconciled with him, gave him gifts,[896] and bestowed robes of honor upon him and upon his son.[897]

In this year, al-Ḥusayn b. Mūsā attacked al-Kurdī[898] who had seized power in the region of Mosul. He overcame al-Kurdī's men and allowed his camp and property to be looted, but al-Kurdī himself escaped and sought refuge in al-Jibāl. He was never [2280] caught. //

In this year, al-Muẓaffar b. Ḥājj conquered territory that had been taken over by some rebels in the Yemen. He captured one of their leaders who was known as al-Ḥakīmī.[899]

On Jumādā II 16, 295 (March 23, 908), Khāqān al-Mufliḥī was ordered to march on Ādharbayjān in order to fight Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj. About four thousand troops were attached to him.

On Ramaḍān 17, 295 (June 20, 908), the emissary of Abū Muḍar Ziyādatallāh Ibn al-Aghlab[900] entered Baghdad, accom-[895] ʿAbdallāh b. Manṣūr, who was also a government official (kātib), may have been his father. See text above, III, 1790, sub anno 256 (869-70).

---

[896] Text: wa-waṣalahū; R: wa-barrahū.

[897] Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ibrāhīm al-Mismaʿī d. 315 (927-8), as amīr of Fārs. See ʿArīb, 133; Eclipse, I, 157. ʿArīb, 69, described him as not quite as learned as his father.

[898] The event referred to is the campaign of the Ḥamdānid Abū al-Hayjā' against Kurdish insurgents. See Canard, Ḥamdanides, 342f. The government troops mentioned by Ṭabarī apparently played a very minor role in this campaign.

[899] The "rebels" (Khārijites) seem to be the same Qarmaṭians mentioned earlier, but no precise identification of al-Ḥakīmī appears to have been suggested so far.

[900] Ziyādatallāh III, the last of the Aghlabid rulers of Ifrīqiyah, was unable to cope with the Kutāmah Berber revolt fanned by the Fāṭimids and had to flee his country panied by Fatḥ al-Aʿjamī.[901] He carried gifts to deliver to al-Muktafī.

In Dhū al-Qaʿdah, 295 (August 2-31, 908), the ransom negotiations between the Muslims and the Byzantines were completed.[902] Three thousand men and women were ransomed.

On Dhū al-Qaʿdah 12, 295 (August 13, 908),[903] al-Muktafī bi-llāh died. After he died, the oath of allegiance was given to Jaʿfar b. al-Muʿtaḍid. Al-Muktafī's caliphate lasted six years, six months, and nineteen days. On the day he died, he was thirty-two years old, less one month.[904] According to another report, he was thirty-three years old. He was born in 264 (September 13, 877-September 2, 878). His patronymic was Abū Muḥammad. His mother was a Turkish slave girl called Jījak.[905] He was of medium size, handsome, of a delicate complexion, with ⌜a full head of⌝ beautiful hair and a luxurious beard.

---

in the following year. For the final collapse of the Aghlabid dynasty and Ziyādatallāh's death somewhere in Palestine between 911 and 917, see Talbi, Émirat, 668ff.

The embassy sent to al-Muktafī was a futile attempt to obtain support from the government in Baghdad. An incomplete list of the gifts sent on this occasion is found in Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 245f., ed. Pellat, V, 191. Ziyādatallāh had sent lavish gifts earlier to al-Muktafī in 291. They are listed by Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhā'ir, 47. Ibn al-Zubayr's list was derived from two sources, the Continuation of Ṭabarī by Abū Muḥammad al-Farghānī and the History of Wazīrs by ʿAlī b. al-Fatḥ al-Muṭawwaq (Muṭawwiq) (Sezgin, GAS, I, 376). For other sources on this embassy and the possible confusion between the gifts sent in 291 and those sent in 295, see Talbi, Émirat, 645f.

[901] No further identification seems possible for this individual.

[902] See text above, III, 2277. For this fidā' al-tamām, see Canard, Sources arabes, 21 and 406 (from Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 192f.).

[903] ʿArīb indicates the date of al-Muktafī's death as Saturday night, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 13 (the night of Friday, August 13, to Saturday, August 14). Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 214, ed. Pellat, V, 176f., expresses astonishment about the discrepancies found regarding the date; he himself indicates Sunday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 13.

[904] If the dates of his birth and death are given here correctly, he was, in fact, not yet thirty-two when he died. Khaṭīb, Taʾrīkh Baghdād, XI, 318, says that he was thirty-one years old.

[905] His mother died before he became caliph. Her name may be Turkish çiçek "flower" (see also EI², V, 619a, s. v. laḳab), but its form is not certain; khnjw, found in later authors depending on Ṭabarī, is an easy corruption of the clearly shown jyjk in R. See, however, the curious and no doubt erroneous statement in Eutychius, Annales, text, 74, that al-Muktafī's mother Bkhtjknh was a daughter of al-Qāsim b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Sulaymān.

⌜The Caliphate of al-Muqtadir bi-llāh⌝

He is[906] Jaʿfar b. Abī al-ʿAbbās al-Muʿtaḍid bi-llāh b. Aḥmad al-Muwaffaq bi-llāh. When the oath of allegiance was given to him, he received the name of al-Muqtadir bi-llāh. He was then thirteen years, one / / month, and twenty ⌜-one⌝ days old. He was born on Friday night, Ramaḍān 22, 282 (Friday, November 14, 895). His patronymic is Abū al-Faḍl. His mother is a slave girl called Shaghab. [2281]

⌜On the day the oath of allegiance was given to him, the treasury reportedly contained fifteen million dīnārs.⌝[907]

After the oath of allegiance had been given to al-Muqtadir, al-Muktafī's corpse was washed, and the funeral prayer was said for him. He was buried somewhere in the house of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Ṭāhir.

On the second day of Minā [Dhū al-Ḥijjah 12, 295 (September 12, 908)], a battle took place between ʿAjj b. Ḥājj and the troops,[908] in which a number of the troops were killed ⌜or wounded⌝. The reason for this was their demand for the expected bonus on the occasion of the oath of allegiance given to al-Muqtadir. The people who were at Minā fled to Bustān Ibn ʿĀmir.[909] At Minā, the [906] Text: thumma būyiʿa (mentioned before in RB); R: wa-huwa.

---

[907] The statement is found only in C and ʿArīb, 22, who quotes Ṭabarī. Since the point here is to criticize the financial difficulties into which al-Muqtadir soon managed to embroil himself, it is indeed hard to assume that it was in the text during the early years of al-Muqtadir's reign. Not surprisingly, later historians give different figures such as, for instance, eight million dīnārs and twenty-five million dirhams, a much smaller sum. See Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 225, ed. Pellat, V, 181. Cf. also Ibn al-Zubayr, Dhakhāʾir, 220f.

[908] The troops here are probably not the ordinary military contingent under the command of the governor of Mecca but rather the numerous men who accompanied the pilgrim caravans. See text above, III, 2110, for the disturbance in Mecca sub anno 271.

[909] R: "Banī ʿĀmir."

troops looted the tent of Abū ʿAdnān Rabīʿah b. Muḥammad,[910] one of the military commanders of the pilgrim caravans.

On the way back, those pilgrims who returned ⌜from Mecca⌝ suffered ⌜greatly⌝ from thirst caused by the shortage of water. A number of them reportedly ⌜died from thirst. I have heard someone tell that a man would urinate into his cupped hand and drink the urine⌝.[911]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik ⌜al-Hāshimī⌝.

[910] See above, n. 679.

[911] The last sentence is found only in B.

The Events of the Year 296

(SEPTEMBER 30, 908 - SEPTEMBER 19, 909)

One of the events was the agreement reached by a number of officers, civilian officials, and qāḍīs to depose al-Muqtadir. They debated who should replace him, and they agreed upon ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿtazz.[912] They discussed the matter with him, and he gave them his consent on condition / / that there would be no bloodshed or fighting. They told him that the power would by handed over to him peacefully and all the troops, officers, and civilian officials who were standing behind them were agreeable to the choice. He therefore solemnly accepted. Leaders in this affair were Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. al-Jarrāḥ and the qāḍī Abū al-Muthannā Aḥmad b. Yaʿqūb.[913] Muḥammad b. Dāwūd b. al-Jarrāḥ agreed ⌜with a number of officers⌝ to murder al-Muqtadir ⌜and give the oath of allegiance to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿtazz⌝. [2282]

Al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan had earlier agreed with a number of officers to murder al-Muqtadir and give the oath of allegiance to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿtazz.[914] But when he saw that he would get along with al-Muqtadir as he liked, he changed his mind concerning the plan. The others immediately pounced upon al-ʿAbbās and killed him. Badr al-Aʿjamī,[915] al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān,[916] and Waṣīf b. Ṣawārtakīn were in charge of the killing. This was on Saturday, Rabīʿ I 19, 296 (Friday, December 16, 908).

---

[912] The great poet and littérateur and caliph for one day. See *EI*², s. v. Ibn al-Muʿtazz. The terseness of Ṭabarī's report on this most dramatic event is surprising. We are not even told that Ibn al-Muʿtazz lost his life in the process; this, of course, was generally known. The brevity may not be due to an editorial decision aimed at avoiding offending the victorious party, as much as embarrassment at the naiveté of a great man of letters mixing in politics. See also below, n. 920.

[913] Abū al-Muthannā appears to be mentioned only in connection with this event. See Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 101, 256.

[914] Text: "shared their view."

[915] No further information is available about him.

[916] For al-Ḥusayn's role in this affair, see Canard, Ḥamdanides, 324ff.

The following morning, on Sunday, al-Muqtadir was deposed by the officers, civilian officials, and qāḍīs of Baghdad. They gave the oath of allegiance to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿtazz and named him al-Rāḍī bi-llāh.[917] Muḥammad b. Saʿīd al-Azraq,[918] the secretary of the army, administered the oath of allegiance to the officers. He put them under oath and had their names called out.[919]

On the same day, a fierce battle lasting from morning to midday was fought between al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān and the palace pages.

On the same day, the troops brought together by ⌜Muḥammad⌝ b. Dāwūd in order to give the oath of allegiance to Ibn al-Muʿtazz scattered and left him. The reason for this was that the eunuch called Mu'nis transported some of the palace pages up the Tigris [2283] in barges. When they were opposite the house in which Ibn // al-Muʿtazz and Muḥammad b. Dāwūd were, they shouted at them, showered them with arrows, and then dispersed. The troops, officers, and civilian officials who were in the house fled, as did Ibn al-Muʿtazz. Some of those who had given the oath of allegiance to Ibn al-Muʿtazz joined al-Muqtadir, offering the excuse that it had not been possible for them to come to him (earlier). Others went into hiding and were subsequently seized and killed. The populace looted the house of Ibn Dāwūd and al-ʿAbbās b. al-Ḥasan. Ibn al-Muʿtazz was among those seized.[920]

---

[917] Other throne names allegedly bestowed upon Ibn al-Muʿtazz are mentioned in other sources.

[918] See Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 165, where it is stated that al-Azraq died in the prison of Mu'nis.

[919] Each officer was called by name when he was put under oath, apparently in order to publicize the extent of Ibn al-Muʿtazz's following.

[920] ʿArīb, 28, quotes Ṭabarī as follows: "Nothing has ever been seen more remarkable than the affair of Ibn al-Muʿtazz and al-Muqtadir, for both the inner circle of notables and the common people (that is, everybody) had agreed to prefer Ibn al-Muʿtazz and accept him and to depose al-Muqtadir because of his youth (still, the latter won out). 'God's command is definitely determined (Qur. 33.38)!'" De Goeje, the editor of ʿArīb (preface, VIII), took this as an indication that the available text of Ṭabarī was defective. It is, however, somewhat unusual for Ṭabarī to reflect on contemporary events in this manner. Possibly, ʿArīb's reference to Ṭabarī here is an oversight, or it goes back to another source, and not the History. Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 165, ll. 5-9, credits Ṭabarī with the remark, made at the time, that the revolt of Ibn al-Muʿtazz was doomed to failure. He did, however, not suggest that this remark occurred in the History.

On Saturday, Rabīʿ I 26, 296 (Friday, December 23, 908), snow fell in Baghdad from early morning to the time[921] of the afternoon prayer. There was an accumulation of about four fingers (about nine cm or almost four inches) in the houses[922] and on the roofs. Nothing like it had reportedly ever been seen in Baghdad.

On Monday, Rabīʿ I 28, 296 (Sunday, December 25, 908), the qāḍī Abū ʿUmar Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, Muḥammad b. ʿAmrawayh, Abū al-Muthannā, Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ, and al-Azraq, the secretary of the army, and a number of others were handed over to Mu'nis al-Khāzin. He let Abū al-Muthannā stay in the Caliph's palace and transferred the others to his own residence. Some ransomed themselves, while others were killed. Still others had someone intercede for them and were released.

In this year, a battle was fought betwen Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad b.ʿAmr b. al-Layth and Subkarā,[923] the page of ʿAmr b. al-Layth. Subkarā took Ṭāhir captive and sent him as well as his brother Yaʿqūb b. Muḥammad[924] to the central authorities in Baghdad. // [2284]

In this year, al-Qāsim b. Sīmā was sent in pursuit of Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn together with a number of officers and troops. In pursuing him, he went as far as Qirqīsiyā, al-Raḥbah, and al-Dāliyah. He wrote to al-Ḥusayn's brother, ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥamdān b. Ḥamdūn, asking him to search for his brother. ʿAbdallāh and al-Ḥusayn met in battle at a place called al-Aʿmā[925] between Takrīt and al-Sawdaqāniyyah on the western bank of the Tigris. ʿAbdallāh was routed, and al-Ḥusayn contacted (the central authorities) seeking a guarantee of safe-conduct. This was granted to him. On Jumādā II 22, 296 (March 18, 909), al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān arrived in Baghdad and took up residence at Bāb Ḥarb.[926]

---

921 Text: qadr; R: waqt.

922 Scil., in the courtyards and gardens of the larger houses.

923 The manuscripts here always add the definite article to the name.

924 Both Ṭāhir and Yaʿqūb were brought to Baghdad in the following year. They are mentioned as having received robes of honor in 310 (922-3). See ʿArīb, 8, 29; Eclipse, I, 16, 83. See also the pedigree in Zambaur, 201.

925 No further information seems to be available for al-Aʿmā and al-Sawdaqānīyah (form uncertain).

926 See Lassner, Topography, 278.

⌜The next morning⌝ he went to the Caliph's palace. A robe of honor was bestowed upon him, and he was appointed governor of Qumm and Qāshān.

On Jumādā II 23, 296 (March 19, 909), a robe of honor was bestowed upon Ibn Dulayl al-Naṣrānī,[927] the secretary and emissary of Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj. ⌜Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj himself was officially appointed governor⌝ of al-Marāghah and Ādharbayjān. Robes of honor were sent to him, and he was ordered to proceed to the region under his jurisdiction.

On Shaʿbān 15, 296 (May 9, 909), a robe of honor was bestowed upon Muʾnis al-Khādim, and he was ordered to go to Ṭarsūs for the summer campaign. Mobilized for this purpose, he left with a considerable force and a number of officers, chamber pages, and troops.

Leading the pilgrimage in this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik ⌜al-Hāshimī⌝.

[927] There is no further information available for him. See Canard, Sources arabes, 21f.

The Events of the Year 297

(SEPTEMBER 20, 909 - SEPTEMBER 8, 910)

One of the events was the summer campaign in Byzantine territory undertaken by Mu'nis al-Khādim and a considerable force from / / the border town of Malaṭyah. Mu'nis was accompanied by Abū al-Agharr al-Sulamī. At the end of 296 (September 19, 909), he overpowered the Byzantines and took several non-Muslims captive. The report on this event reached the central authorities in Baghdad on al-Muḥarram 6, 297 (September 25, 909).[928] [2285]

In this year, al-Layth b. ʿAlī b. al-Layth ⌜al-Ṣaffār⌝ came with an army to Fārs and seized power there driving out Subkarā. This was after the central authorities had appointed Subkarā governor, subsequent to his sending Ṭāhir b. Muḥammad to them as a captive.[929] Al-Muqtadir ordered Mu'nis al-Khādim to go to Fārs in order to fight al-Layth b. ʿAlī. Mu'nis went there in Ramaḍān, 297 (May 14-June 12, 910).

⌜Also⌝ in this year, in Shawwāl (June 13-July 11, 910), al-Muqtadir sent al-Qāsim b. Sīmā with a large body of troops on the summer campaign in Byzantine territory.[930]

In this year, a battle took place between Mu'nis al-Khādim and al-Layth b. ʿAlī b. al-Layth. Al-Layth was routed and later taken prisoner. A large number of his men were killed. Many others applied to Mu'nis for guarantees of safe-conduct. The government forces then entered al-Nūbandajān where al-Layth[931] had seized power.

[928] See Canard, Sources arabes, 22.
[929] See above, n. 924.
[930] See Canard, Sources arabes, 22.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik [2286] ⌜b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-ʿAbbās b. Muḥammad⌝. / /

[931] R: "the central authorities."

The Events of the Year 298

(SEPTEMBER 9, 910 - AUGUST 28, 911)

One of the events was al-Qāsim b. Sīmā's summer campaign in Byzantine territory.

In this year, al-Muqtadir sent Waṣīf Kāmah al-Daylamī with an army and a number of officers to Fārs to fight Subkarā, the page of ʿAmr b. al-Layth.

⌜In this year, a battle took place between Subkarā ⌝ and Waṣīf Kāmah, in which Waṣīf routed Subkarā driving him out of the region under his jurisdiction in Fārs. Waṣīf and his men then entered Fārs. A ⌜large⌝ number of Subkarā's men applied to Waṣīf for guarantees of safe-conduct; Subkarā's commander-in-chief who was known as al-Qattāl[932] was taken captive. Subkarā fled with his money and stores to Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl ⌜b. Aḥmad⌝. Aḥmad seized him and everything he had with him, and then arrested and incarcerated him.

In this year, a battle took place between Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl b. ⌜Aḥmad and al-Muḥammad b.⌝ ʿAlī b. al-Layth[933] in the region of Bust and al-Rukhkhaj. Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl took Muḥammad captive.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik.

---

[932] Al-Qattāl is first mentioned sub anno 297 (909-10). See Eclipse, I, 17f. He was released from prison in 302 (914-5), and he is mentioned once more in the following year. See ʿArīb, 49, 57.

[933] Another cousin of the father of Ṭāhir and Yaʿqūb, he was released from prison in 302 (914-5). See ʿArīb, 49.

The Events of the Year 299

(AUGUST 29, 911 - AUGUST 17, 912)

One of the events was the summer campaign undertaken from the region of Ṭarsūs by Rustum b. Bardū who was in charge of the border region ⌜for Bunayy b. Nafīs.[934] He was accompanied by [2287] Damyānah.⌝ Rustum laid siege // to the fortress of Malīḥ al-Armanī.[935] He then left it and burned the suburbs of Dhū al-Kilāʿ.[936]

In this year, a messenger of Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl ⌜b. Aḥmad⌝ brought a letter from Aḥmad to the central authorities in Baghdad. In it, Aḥmad reported that he had conquered Sijistān and that his men had entered (the province) and driven out al-Ṣaffār's men. Al-Muʿaddal b. Alī b. al-Layth[937] had come to him with those of his men who were with him to seek a guarantee of safe-conduct. At the time, al-Muʿaddal was staying in Zaranj, and he went to Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl who was staying in Bust and al-Rukhkhaj. Ibn Ismāʿīl sent him and his family and those with him to Harāt. The distance between Sijistān and Bust and al-Rukhkhaj was sixty *farsakh*s (360 km). The mail pouch with the report on this event reached the central authorities in Baghdad on Monday, Ṣafar 10, 299 (Monday, October 7, 911).

---

[934] Bunayy b. Nafīs first appears in the sources sub anno 296 (Eclipse, I, 12). He is mentioned as having been a son-in-law of the Stewardness Fāṭimah whose funeral he attended in 298 (Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 9; Eclipse, I, 20). He appears again in 311 and 316-7 (ʿArīb, 111, 143; Eclipse, I, 105, 183, 192; Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 59) and, for the last time, in 320 (932) (ʿArīb, 172). See also Ṣābi', Wuzarā', and Canard, Sources arabes, 153.

[935] Nothing is heard of Malīḥ al-Armanī after the defeat he suffered in 318 (930) (or the following year, see Canard, Sources arabes, 153). See ʿArīb, 36, 146; Canard, Sources arabes, 22, 61, and Vasiliev, II, index.

[936] R: "Dhū al-Kulāʿ." See Honigmann, Ostgrenze, 67; Masʿūdī, Tanbīh, 178.

[937] See Zambaur, 200f., who vocalizes al-Muʿaddil. The information found in the Ta'rīkh-e Sīstān is essentially the same as that in Ṭabarī (information provided by E. Yarshater).

⌜In this year, al-ʿUṭayr, one of Zikrawayh's men, arrived in Baghdad to seek a guarantee of safe-conduct. He was accompanied by al-Agharr,[938] another of Zikrawayh's officers.⌝

On Dhū al-Ḥijjah 4, 299 (July 22, 912), ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. al-Furāt[939] fell out of favor. He was detained, and his ⌜houses⌝ and ⌜the houses of⌝ his people were sequestered. All of his and their possessions which were found were seized, and his houses and those of the sons of his brothers[940] and their families[941] were looted. Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh ⌜b. Yaḥyā⌝ b. Khāqān[942] was appointed wazīr.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik. // [2288]

[938] No further information seems to exist for him.
[939] His dates are 242-312 (855-924). For his brother, see above, n. 415.
[940] ʿAlī's prominent brothers were Aḥmad and Jaʿfar, but this does not mean that the dual akhawayhi should be read here. Only a few of the presumably numerous nephews are listed in Sourdel, Vizirat, 747.
[941] R: "his family."
[942] D. 312 (924-5). See EI², s. v. Ibn Khāḳān (3).

The Events of the Year 300

(AUGUST 18, 912 - AUGUST 6, 913)

One of the events was the arrival in Baghdad of a messenger from the official in charge of Barqah with a report concerning a rebel who had come out against him.[943] Barqah belongs to the administrative region of Egypt, extending four *farsakh*s west[944] of it and beyond that to the administrative region of the Maghrib. He had overpowered the rebel's army and killed a number of his men. The messenger had with him strings with the ears and noses of those killed, as well as several of the rebel's banners.

In this year, the people of Baghdad suffered from many illnesses and diseases. Dogs and wolves had reportedly contracted rabies[945] and sought out humans, horses, and cattle. When they bit a man, it caused his death.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik ⌜al-Hāshimī.⌝

[943] "Rebel (khāriji)"—a term used also with reference to the Qarmaṭians in the Yemen—refers here to the Northwest African Fāṭimids of ʿUbaydallāh al-Mahdī, whose son led the expedition against Barqah. See also the events reported in the following years and, below, n. 971.

[944] Lit., "behind." According to this statement, the province of Barqah began twenty-four km beyond the borders of Egypt and extended vaguely west.

[945] RC: kānat, which is erroneous. The words used for animals probably included a wider range than is indicated in the translation.

The Events of the Year 301

(AUGUST 7, 913 - JULY 26, 914)

One of the events was al-Muqtadir's dismissal of Muḥammad b. ʿUbaydallāh from the wazīrate. Al-Muqtadir incarcerated him as well as his sons ʿAbdallāh and ʿAbd-al-Wāḥid[946] and appointed ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā b. Dāwūd b. al-Jarrāḥ as his wazīr.

In this year, ⌜too,⌝ there was much pestilence in Baghdad, including a type that was called ḥnyn, / / and another called mās(ḥ)irā.[947] The former was benign, but the latter was a lethal plague. [2289]

In this year, a man reportedly known as Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥallāj,[948] a prestidigitator, was brought into the house of the [946] Muḥammad was dismissed on al-Muḥarram 10 (August 16) (Ṣafadī, Wāfī, XI, 95, 11. 7f.). His son ʿAbdallāh was wazīr for a little over a year in 312-3 (924-5). He died in 314 (926-7). See Sourdel, Vizirat, 433ff., and *EI*², s. v. Ibn Khāḳān (4). Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 284f., 302, 306, has some more details about what happened to ʿAbdallāh and ʿAbd al-Wāḥid when their father was appointed and when he was deposed. ʿAbd al-Wāḥid was reportedly released on Thursday night, Jumādā II 9, 301 (January 10, 914), a Monday (!). ʿAbdallāh, was released on Friday, Shawwāl 1, 301 (Saturday, April 30, 914).

---

[947] For ḥnyn, see Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CCV. It is hardly to be corrected to khunān "rheum," known in particular as a disease of camels.

For māsirā (or, as in R: māshirā), see Ṭabarī, Introductio etc., CDLXXIX, where reference is made to Syriac māshrā (see Brockelmann, *Lex. Syr.*², 408a) which translates Greek erysipelas.

[948] This passage was translated and discussed by Massignon, *Passion*², I, 504f. In view of the importance which al-Ḥallāj was to assume shortly afterwards, this earliest testimony has particular significance. Massignon seems to be right in his assumption that its author was indeed Ṭabarī and that it is not a later interpolation. See above, Foreword, xvii f.

Al-Ḥallāj was seen by Ṭabarī, and no doubt by most of the religious and political leadership in Baghdad at the time, as a fanatic and troublemaker. When he gained support among men highly placed in the government, his Rasputin-like influence was considered more and more dangerous. The sad fate he suffered was thus hardly due to religious intolerance; it resulted from the struggle of the government to wazīr ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā, accompanied by a companion.[949] I have heard a number of people express the opinion[950] that he claimed divine lordship.[951] He and his companion were hung for three days from the beginning of each day until midday. They were then taken down and remanded to prison.

⌜He[952] remained in prison for a long time. A number of people, among them Naṣr al-Qushūrī, were seduced by him. Eventually, people became unruly and cursed those who were finding fault with him, and his hands and feet were cut off. Following that, he was decapitated and cremated.⌝

In this year, al-Ḥusayn b. Ḥamdān ⌜b. Ḥamdūn⌝ undertook the summer campaign. A dispatch arrived at Baghdad from Ṭarsūs which indicated that he had conquered many fortresses and killed a large number of Byzantines.[953]

In this year, Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad, ⌜the master of Khurāsān and Transoxania,⌝ was killed by the most intimate of his Turkish pages. This page and two other pages with him entered Aḥmad's tent and murdered him. Then they fled and were never caught.

---

maintain its position in view of the numerous agitators working against it. For a contemporary, the affair of al-Ḥallāj was but one of many similar problems, and did not loom large in comparison with the Qarmaṭians, the Fāṭimids, even the pro-Umayyads. Once al-Ḥallāj was dead, opinion could, and did, change rapidly.

Massignon was inclined to believe that "Abū Masʿūd," as a patronymic of al-Ḥallāj not usually used for him, was the original reading of mushaʿwidh, "prestidigitator, conjurer." He was right, however, to hesitate with this view (see *Passion*², I, 504). "Abū Masʿūd" appears to be an attempt by later generations to soften the harsh but common epithet. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, VIII, 57, for instance, appears to indicate this when he says, "as some have said, he was a mushaʿwidh, while others have said that he was dealing with supernatural verity (ṣāḥib ḥaqīqah)."

[949] See Massignon, *Passion*², I, 513, for a discussion of the reports on al-Hallāj's first encounter with the law. The man with al-Ḥallāj was al-Karnabāʾī. See *Passion*², I, 513, and the mostly speculative references to that individual listed in *Passion*², index, IV, 214b.

[950] R: man yadhkuru "mention."

[951] See the interesting speculations on the implications of this supposed claim to divinity in Massignon, *Passion*², I, 342ff.

[952] The passage referring to the year 309 (922) when al-Ḥallāj was executed is found only in C. See above, Foreword, xvii f.

[953] See Canard, Sources arabes, 22f.

In this year, discord broke out between Naṣr b. Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad[954] and the paternal uncle of his father, Isḥāq b. Aḥmad.[955] The pages, / / civilian officials, and a number of officers [2290] of Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl were with Naṣr as were his father's money, horses, and weapons. After his father was killed, Naṣr fled to Bukhārā, while Isḥāq b. Aḥmad was in Samarqand sick with an attack of podagra. (The latter) called upon the people in Samarqand to give the oath of allegiance to him as their leader. Both Naṣr and Isḥāq sent letters to the central authorities in Baghdad claiming control over the region (previously) under the jurisdiction of Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad.[956] Isḥāq reportedly dispatched his letters to ʿImrān al-Marzubānī[957] for delivery to the central authorities, while Naṣr b. Aḥmad ⌜b. Ismāʿīl⌝ similarly dispatched his letters to Ḥammād b. Aḥmad.[958] Both ʿImrān and Ḥammād did what (they were asked to do).

On Shaʿbān 15, 301 (March 16, 914), a battle took place between Naṣr b. ⌜Aḥmad b.⌝ Ismāʿīl and his Bukhārīs and Isḥāq b. Aḥmad, the paternal uncle of his father, and his ⌜Samarqandīs⌝. ⌜Naṣr and his men routed Isḥāq and the Samarqandīs⌝ and the men of those regions that had attached themselves to them. They dispersed and fled leaving Isḥāq. This battle between them took place at the gate of Bukhārā. After the Bukhārīs routed Isḥāq b. Aḥmad and his men, they advanced on the Samarqandīs, and another battle took place between them, in which the Bukhārīs again overpowered the Samarqandīs, routing them and causing a bloodbath among them. The Bukhārīs now forced their way into Samarqand and took Isḥāq b. Aḥmad captive. They appointed a 954 Naṣr d. 329 (940-1). See Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 120;Eclipse, II, 7.

---

955 Isḥāq's capture is reported by Hamadhānī, Takmilah, sub anno 302. See Zambaur, 202f.

956 R: "Aḥmad b. Ismāʿīl," which is an error.

957 Possibly, the Marzubānī who is mentioned by Ibn al-Athīr sub anno 287 as the representative of Ismāʿīl b. Aḥmad in the capital. It may be noted that the father of the famous littérateur al-Marzubanı who was born around this time was called ʿImrān (b. Mūsā), but it does not seem possible to connect him with the above-mentioned individual. R: "Ibn al-Marzubān," but again, it is not possible to connect him with the individual mentioned by Masʿūdī, Murūj, VIII, 267, ed. Pellat, V, 201.

958 I have not succeeded in finding additional information about him.

son of ʿAmr b. Naṣr b. Aḥmad[959] to take over his administrative [2291] duties in Samarqand. //

In this year, Ibn al-Baṣrī's[960] Maghribīs entered Barqah, and the official appointed by the central authorities was driven out.

Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. ʿAlī b. Aḥmad b. Abī Zunbūr al-Mādharā'ī[961] was appointed to take charge of the administration and land tax of Egypt.

In this year, Abū Saʿīd al-Jannābī, the (Qarmaṭian) rebel in the region of al-Baḥrayn and Hajar, was killed, reportedly by one of his eunuchs.

In this year, there were many illnesses and diseases in Baghdad causing great mortality among the city's inhabitants. Most of this reportedly took place in al-Ḥarbiyyah[962] and among the people of the suburbs.

In this year, an officer[963] of Ibn al-Baṣrī arrived in Alexandria with Berbers and Maghribīs. In this year, too, a dispatch from [959] If this son of ʿAmr (RB: "ʿUmar") was a grandson of the above-mentioned Naṣr b. Aḥmad, he must have been very young at best. If he was a grandson of the elder Naṣr b. Aḥmad, the brother of Ismāʿīl, his relationship to the younger Naṣr b. Aḥmad would have been that of a third cousin.

---

[960] That is, the Fāṭimid ʿUbaydallāh. According to Fāṭimid sources, the official, Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ, fled. The Fāṭimid troops entered Barqah on Rajab 7, 301 (February 6, 914). A relief attempt later in the year, under Aḥmad b. Ṣāliḥ, was frustrated.

[961] D. 345 (957). See Gottschalk, Die Mādarā'ijjūn, 79-116. RB: "Akhī Zunbūr."

[962] Northwest of the Round City, See Lassner, Topography, 68, 254, n. 26.

[963] That is, Ḥabāsah. According to Fāṭimid sources, Ḥabāsah and his men did not enter Alexandria before 302. See below, no. 972.

Takīn,[964] the governor of the central authorities, arrived in Baghdad from Egypt, asking for reinforcements.

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik.

[964] Takīn al-Khāṣṣah Abū Manṣūr Takīn b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥarbī al-Khazarī, a mawlā of al-Muʿtaḍid, grew up during al-Muʿtaḍid's reign and became an officer (see also above, n.130?). He was first appointed governor of Egypt as the successor of ʿĪsā al-Nūsharī near the end of 297 (August, 910) (ʿArīb, 34; Ibn al-Athīr). His request for reinforcements was an unpleasant surprise for al-Muqtadir and his advisers, since they had not taken the Fāṭimid threat seriously earlier (ʿArīb, 51). Takīn's first term as governor of Egypt came to an end on Thursday, Dhū al-Qaʿdah 14, 303 (Thursday, May 31, 915). He was reappointed in the fall of 307 (919). He remained in office until Sunday, Rabīʿ I 13, 309 (Sunday, July 22, 921), and was reinstated for a few turbulent days later that month. His longest tenure was the last one which began at the turn of the years 311 and 312 (March-April 924), and ended with his death on Saturday, Rabīʿ I 16, 321 (Saturday, March 16, 933). See, for instance, Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 75; Kindī, Wulāh, 281; Eclipse, I, 258; Ṣafadī, Wāfī X, 386; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 171-73, 195-97, 200, 210-37; Bacharach, "The career of ...al-Ikhshīd," 589ff.

The Events of the Year 302

(JULY 27, 914 - JULY 16, 915)

One of the events was the dispatch of Ibn ʿAbd al-Bāqī[965] with two thousand horsemen to Ṭarsūs for the summer campaign. The wazīr ʿAlī b. ʿĪsā sent him there to support Bishr,[966] the eunuch of Ibn Abī al-Sāj, who was governor of Ṭarsūs on behalf of the central authorities. They were unable to go on the summer campaign but undertook a winter campaign in severe cold and [2292] snow.[967] / /

In this year, the ʿAlid al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī al-Uṭrūsh[968] seized power in Ṭabaristān and then moved from Āmul to S(h)ālūs.[969] While he was staying there, Ṣuʿlūk,[970] the master of al-Rayy, sent an army against him. It was, however, unable to hold its own [in S(h)ālūs], and al-Ḥasan b. ʿAlī returned. ⌜People had never seen

---

[965] Abū ʿUmayr ʿAdī b. Aḥmad b. ʿAbd al-Bāqī, the master of Adana, was removed by al-Muʿtaḍid in 288 (901) (Masʿudı, Muruj, VIII, 198, ed. Pellat, V, 168) but soon again became the leading personality in the border region. He continued to play this role beyond 334-5 (945-6), when Masʿūdī was finishing his Murūj (II, 318, ed. Pellat, II, 44). See Canard, Sources arabes, 37f., 42, 69, 78, 407. See also above, n. 178.

[966] See above, n. 788.

[967] See Canard, Sources arabes, 23, for this passage and the later one reporting the results of the campaign.

[968] The Zaydī ruler al-Uṭrūsh died in 304 (917). According to Zambaur, table D, n. 4, his Ḥusaynid pedigree was Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. Ḥasan b. ʿAlī b. ʿUmar (the brother of the imām Zayd) b. ʿAlī Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn. See Ibn Khaldūn, Muqaddimah, trans. Rosenthal, I, 363.

[969] The main entry in Yāqūt is Shālūs, while the geographical coordinates are given under Sālūs (Muʿjam, III, 237 and 13). Yāqūt indicates the distance between Āmul (Ṭabarī's native city) and Shālūs as twenty farsakhs (120 km).

[970] Miskawayh, Tajārib, V, 102 (=Eclipse, I, 36), has Akhū Ṣuʿlūk; ʿArīb, 51, ll. 1f., speaks of Aḥmad b. ʿAlī known as Ṣuʿlūk. Here apparently Akhū Ṣuʿlūk Aḥmad b. ʿAlī is meant; he is often referred to as Akhū Ṣuʿlūk. He was killed by Yūsuf b. Abī al-Sāj in 311 (924). See Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 43, referring to Aḥmad b. Ṣuʿlūk; Eclipse, I 117; Ṣābi', Wuzarā', 55f. His brother seems to have been Muḥammad b. ʿAlī Ṣuʿlūk (or b. Ṣuʿlūk). See Eclipse, I, 39 (where Muḥammad is described as a cousin of the ruler of Khurāsān) and 45.

anything like al-Uṭrūsh's justice, his exemplary way of life, and the way he established truth.[971]

In this year, Ibn al-Baṣrī's man Ḥabāsah[972] entered Alexandria and seized power. He reportedly arrived there by sea in two hundred ships.

In this year, Ḥabāsah, [Ibn al-Baṣrī's man,] arrived at a place called Saft,[973] a day's journey from al-Fusṭāṭ. He later fell back and withdrew,[974] encamping between al-Fusṭāṭ and Alexandria.

In this year, Mu'nis al-Khādim went to Egypt to fight Ḥabāsah. He was well equipped with men, weapons, and money.

On Jumādā I 23, 302 (December 14, 914), al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh, who was known as Ibn al-Jaṣṣāṣ, was arrested with his two sons,[975] and all their property was confiscated. He was put in fetters and incarcerated.

On Jumādā I 24, 302 (December 15, 914), a battle took place [in Egypt] between the government forces and Ḥabāsah and his men.

---

971 "Established truth" seems here to reflect a Shīʿite notion. The sentence, found in C and Ibn al-Athīr, may have been intentionally omitted by the scribe of the prototype of RB. If Ṭabarī in fact used it, it was probably an expression of local pride. He would hardly have endorsed a Shīʿite pretender in such glowing terms for any other reason.

972 His name is Ḥabāsah b. Yūsuf (al-ʿUyūn wa-al-ḥadāʾiq, ed. Dāwūd, I, 257; Stern, Studies, 111). The Fāṭimid troops entered Alexandria on Ṣafar 2, 302 (August 27, 914), see Stern, Studies, 112. Some vacillation is shown in the sources with respect to the vocalization of the name (see, for instance, Dhahabī, Mushtabih, 208 and n. 4; Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 172, n. 4). Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, ed. Tornberg, VIII, 67, and Maqrīzī, Ittiʿāẓ, 42, state that he was killed by ʿUbaydallāh al-Mahdī soon after his return from Egypt, while Ibn Taghrībirdī, Nujūm, III, 184, says that he was killed during the infighting mentioned below. Cf. also Dhahabī, Duwal, I, 134. All this seems mere speculation, even if it is very likely. The Fāṭimid sources published by Stern, Studies, 112, ll. 9f., and 114, ll. 11 ff., do not fully solve the problem of Ḥabāsah's fate, but they provide another clue by referring to his friction with al-Qāʾim, al-Mahdī's son. ʿArīb, 68, refers sub anno 305 to what appears to have been the events of 301 and 302, presumably confusing two different Fāṭimid attacks on Egypt. Cf., further, Eutychius, Annales, text, 79f.

973 Or: "a way station called Saft." Cf. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 97.

974 The text does not make it clear whether Ḥabāsah turned south after leaving Saft, or north toward Alexandria. The latter appears to be more likely.

975 R: "four of his children." A son called Abū ʿAlī Aḥmad b. Abī ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥusayn appears in Tanūkhī, Nishwār, I, 29 (=ed. Margoliouth, Table-Talk, 18); Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 211. See also Rosenthal, Humor, 13, n. 2. Hamadhānī, Takmilah, 15, has more details about the incident, but he does not mention the names of the sons.

A number of men on both sides were killed or wounded. One day later, another battle took place with about the same results. Then ⌜in Jumādā II, 302 (December 22, 914-January 19, 915),⌝ a third battle took place. On Jumādā II 15, 302 (January 5, 915), a dispatch [2293] arrived at Baghdad with the news that a battle had taken place / / between the government forces and the Maghribīs, in which the latter were routed.

In this year, a dispatch from Bishr, the official in charge of Ṭarsūs on behalf of the central authorities, reached ⌜the central authorities in⌝ Baghdad. In it, Bishr mentioned his campaign in Byzantine territory. He mentioned the fortresses he had conquered there, the booty he had made, and the captives he had taken. He had also taken one hundred and fifty Patrikioi captive, and the total number of those captured was about two thousand.

⌜On Rajab 19, 302 (February 7, 915),⌝ a report arrived at Baghdad from Egypt with news that the government forces had met Ḥabāsah and the Maghribīs in battle and that the Maghribīs had suffered defeat. Seven thousand of them were either killed or taken captive; the rest fled in disarray. ⌜The battle had taken place on Thursday, Jumādā II 29, 302 (Thursday, January 19, 915).⌝

In this year, Ḥabāsah and the Maghribīs with him departed from Alexandria to return to the Maghrib. Before that, Ḥabāsah had reportedly discussed guarantees of safe-conduct with the representative of the central authorities in Egypt and letters ⌜had been exchanged between them⌝. Ḥabāsah's departure was reportedly caused by a disagreement that had arisen among his men at the place from which he had come.[976]

In this year, Yānis al-Khādim[977] attacked the Arab tribesmen in the region of Wādī al-Dhi'āb and its environs. He caused a bloodbath, reportedly killing seven thousand of them. He looted their tents and found an uncountable amount of money and [976] This seems to mean that dissension broke out among Ḥabāsah's officers at his home base in Ifrīqiyah.

---

[977] R: "Mu'nis," clearly a mistake. For Wādī al-Dhi'āb, see above, n. 41. Ibn al-Athīr adds that the bedouins belonged to the Banū Shaybān goods belonging to merchants who had been waylaid and robbed by them.

On Dhū al-Ḥijjah 6, 302 (June 22, 915), Bidʿah, the mawlāh of *ʿArīb, the mawlāh of* al-Maʾmūn, died.[978] / / [2294]

Leading the pilgrimage this year was al-Faḍl b. ʿAbd al-Malik.

On Dhū al-Ḥijjah 22,[979] 902 (July 6, 915), the Arab tribesmen went out from al-Ḥājir,[980] three *farsakh*s (eighteen km) from the desert, against the pilgrims returning from Mecca.[981] They waylaid them and seized all their cash and whatever goods they wanted. They also drove away all their camels ⌜that they wanted⌝ and reportedly seized[982] two hundred and eighty free women, not counting the male and female slaves seized.

---

[978] Cf. ʿArīb, 54; Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 129; Ṣafadī, Wāfī, X, 99; Stigelbauer, Sängerinnen, 18-31, 49-53. Bidʿah was so successful in her profession as an entertainer that she left a large fortune. She retained great artistic ability to the end of her life. See Ṣābiʾ, Wuzarāʾ, 215. ʿArīb, 54, speaks of her living unmarried for sixty years. This may mean that she died sixty years old, or rather, that she lived for sixty years after puberty. Her mentor, the famous songstress ʿArīb (often vocalized ʿUrayb) is said to have lived from 181 (797-8) to 277 (890-1) (see the editor's footnote in Tanūkhī, Nishwār, I, 270f., ed. Margoliouth, Table-Talk, 131ff.), so that there was plenty of time for Bidʿah, her client (mawlāh), to have worked with her, regardless of the date of her birth. For another reference to Bidʿah in Tanūkhī, see Nishwār, I, 89 (which has the correct text as against ed. Margoliouth, Table-Talk. 50). Bidʿah was in contact with Ibrāhīm b. al-Mudabbir on behalf of ʿArīb. See Aghānī, XIX, 125f., Aghānī[3], XXII, 181-83.

It is worth noting that this trivial item in fact concludes a majestic work that deals with events that are among the greatest in world history.

[979] The date is given here according to the days of the month, but R indicates the number of nights remaining to the end of the month. Ibn al-Jawzī, Muntaẓam, VI, 128, introduces the episode with a reference to the ʿAlid who attacked the pilgrims in conjunction with the Banū Ṣāliḥ b. Mudrik al-Ṭāʾī. See also Madelung, "Fatimiden und Baḥrainqarmaṭen," 48.

[980] See text above, II, 288.

[981] R: "Mecca Road.;

[982] R: min al-nisāʾ, supplying the words missing in the edition.